hands, charged her in the prefence of God and his Angels, as she would answer her before them, when all should appeare in iudgement, that shee should fall downe before the Lady Maries Grace her daughter in Law; and in her name in like manner, aske her forgiveness for the wrongs shee had done her, for till that was accomplished (the said) her conscience could not bee quiet: what her offence was to her ward; wee know not, but may be supposed not to bee capital, the Queenes case wayed, the time considered, and her enemies none of the meanest, onely this I obserue, that as shee cleared her conscience of the lesser crimes, so vndoubtedly would shee haue done of the greater, if any had been committed, and so as herselfe instantly desired, I count her case to be charitably spoken of, and leaue her and them vnto the Lord.

(94) But as one pillar for the Gospel's defence was fallen by the death of Queene Anne, so another was raised, by raising Cromwell from the base of his birth, no better indeed than a Blacke-Smiths son, who serueng great Wolsey in the office of his Solicitor, was employed by him for the suppression of forty Monasteries, to the erection of his Colledges at Oxford and Ipwich, by which he mounted thole steps of estate, which let (but not kept) him in the high Chaire of his authority; first by King Henric hee was made Master of his Iewell-house, then Baron of Okeham in Rutlandshire, then Knight of the Garter, ere long was created Earle of Essex, then was hee made Lord great Chamberlaine, and lastly ordained the Kings Vicar Generall, and thus farre fortune brought him from the forge for a fall.

(95) For King Henry vntaied in religious resolution (the Supremacy settled where hee would haue it, and the Reuenues of all Monasteries giuen him by Parliament) fought no further to reforme the Churches abuses, but onely gaue way that the Lords Prayer, the Creede, and Commandements might be read in English, which Cromwell procured to be enacted by Parliament. The Commons then misliking that their mummings must downe, and the Monkes fore troubled to mingle English in their Masses, the Lincolshire men beganne a Commotion vnder the conduct of D. Mackarell a Monke, who named himselfe Captaine Cobler, and his followers were growne well neere vnto twenty thousand. Against these, the King in person prepared, sending forth his command vnto severall Counties, to charge them with a taxation of furnished Souldiers to meet him at Amphell, as by * one we haue seen signed with the Rampe of his hand, and sent vnto the Bishoppe of Excester for foure hundred able men, whereof sixscore to be Archers, which great preparation being knowne to the Rebels, they sent to his Maiesty these Articles subscribed with many of their hands, the tenour whereof out of the Originall it selfe was as followeth.

To the King our Soueraigne Lord.

Pleaseth it your Highnes to be aduertised, that your poore Commonalty, true and faithfull Subiects, in your County of Lincolne, at this present time assembled, sinderth our felices griued in these Articles hereafter following.

First, for the suppression of so many religious houses, as be at this instant time suppressed. Whereby the seruice of God is not onely diminished, but also the poorealty of your Realme bee vnrelieued, and many persons bee put from their liuings, and left at large, which we thinke is a great hinderance to the Common-wealth.

The second Article is, that wee humble beseech your Grace, that the Act of vles may bee repealed, because we thinke that by the said Act we be clearly restrained of our liberties, in the declaration of our Willes, concerning our lands: aswell for the payment of our debts, for doing of your Grace seruice,

The thing of

as for helping and relieuing of our children, which wee haue had by the sufferance of your lawes by a long continuance, which as we thinke is great hurt and difcommodity to the Common-wealth.

The third Article is, that where your Grace hath a tax, or quindecim granted vnto you by Act of Parliament, payable the next yeere: which is, and euer hath been leueable of shepe and cattall: And the shepe and cattall of your Subiects within this faide Shire, are now at this instant vtterly decayed and gone. Whereby yff your Grace will take the faide tax, Your said Subiects should be constrained to pay iij. d. for a beast, and xii. d. for xx. shepe: And that would bee an importunate charge to theym, considered the poverty that they bee in already, and the losse which they haue sustained these two yeeres by-past.

The fowrt Article is, that wee your trow & faithfull Subiects, thinke that your Grace takes of your Council, and very nygh about you, such Personages as be of lawe birth, and faire reputation, which haue procured the premysses, most especial for their singler lue and aduantage: the which wee suspect to bee the Lord Cromwell, & Sir Richard Rich Chan- celler of the augmentations.

The fift Article is, your Grace to haue the xth. and first fruits of euery spiritual promotion, of the value of xx. l. and above. And of all other vnder the said value which doe not keepe residence and hospitality of their said Benefices.

The sixt Article is, that wee your true Subiectes find them griued, that there be diuers Bishoppes of Yngland, of your Grace late promotion, that haue subuerted the faith of Crist, as we thinke, which is the Archbyschoppe of Canterbury, the Byshoppe of Rochefer, the Byshoppe of Saerbury, the Byshoppe of S. Dawes, and the Bishoppe of Dewelyn. And in especiall as wee thinke the beginning of all the trouble of this Realme, and the gret exactions that hath been taken of your poore Commonalty, haue ryfen by the occasion of the Bishoppe of Lincolne: by whose officers, and by other of the Lord Cromwells seruants, a great rumor & noise is risen, and the common vocce is, that such Iowellys, plate, and other ornaments of our Parish Churches, which we occupie in the seruice and honour of God, should bee taken from vs and spoiled in lyke manner and facion, as the housys of Religion hath bene. For a reformation of all and singler the aforeseyd abvies, Wee your poore and trowe subiects humble requirys your grace and maiesty, that it might please your highnesse to call vnto you the Nobility of this your Realme, to see such Order and direction concerning all and singler the premysses, as may stand with honor and seruey of your grace, the welthe and prosperity of your Realme, and the contentation of vs your poore Subiects, and other the whole Commonalty of this your Realme. Whereby we shall not onely accept your Grace to be the Head and Soueraigne of vs your Subiects, but also accept and take your Grace to be Supreme head of the Church of Yngland, which wee doe knowledge your Grace trowe inheritance and right.

Also your faide trowe and faithfull subiects, with the hole assent of all your Commonalty of the faide Shire, most humble beseech your gracious Maiesty, to perdon this poore bearer in doing this his message to your Highnesse, who is your trowe and faithfull subiect, and hath taken this message vpon him for the feruent loue that hee hath to your Grace most in especiall, and for the staying of your Commonalty euer lens this ruffill began, hath bene as gladd with all his diligence to stay the commune people for the effusion of blood, as bee all his powre he might. The King with good words pacified these Commons, who laying aside weapons embraced their pardons.

(96) But this cloud scarcely ouerblowne, another more dangerous arose in the North, which threatned darker stormes by the Skies ouercast: for fortie thousand Rusticks assembled in Torkeshire, furnished with Horse, Armour, Artillery and Abilliments for warre, threatened to set the flay of Estate vpon the props of their giddy inuentions. Their pretence was Religion, and defence of holy Church, their Banners painted with the fiue wounds of our Lord, the Chalice, the Cake and other like inuentions of Rome, and vpon their fleeces was writte the name of the Lord: and so forward, and so feruent were they in their proceedings, that this their attempt must be termed the holy Pilgrimage. Neither were the Rurall onely guilty in this rebellion, but others of greater place and degree were associates therein, namely, Edward Lord Archbishop of York, and the Lord Thomas Darcy, though both of them constrained by the Rebels as the said Archbishoppe testified vnder his owne hand: but voluntary and most forward were the Clergy of thole parts, the Lord Lumley, Sir Thomas and Sir William Percy, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bigot, and Sir Robert Dugill all of them Knights, John Lacy, Richard Beamond and Robert Bowes Esquires: & the Bailiffs of Smythe of Leeds, Kellam, and of Beverly. And for Captaine Generall, was Robert Aske a meane Gentleman, and one Rudstone his Associate in the Field. Other Commanders they had out of the Commonfoote, as Tames Diamond Generall of the Foot, and a poore Fisherman, stiled by himselfe and others, the Earle of Powerty. What authority these bare, among these rude multitude may partly be perceived by their Mandates, and Commissions, sent forth in their names, and subscribed with their owne hands, as from the Originalls of some of them is here to be scene.

Lords, Knights, Masters, Kinmen, and Friends, wee perceive that yee be informed that this Assemblie our Pilgrimage, which we by the fauour and mercy of Almighty God intendeth to proceede in, is because the King our Soueraigne Lord hath had much inuocacions of vs, wee doubt not but yee doe knowe and remember that to our powers we haue bene alwaies as ready in payments and seruices to his Highnesse as any his subiects: and further to ascertaine you of the cause of our faide assemblie and pilgrimage is this, That forsomuch that such simple and euill disposed persons being of the Kings Council, hath not onely incensed his Grace with many things which bee contrarie to the Faith of God, honour of the Kings Maiesty, and the Common wealth of this Realme: and thereby hath destroyed, and yet vtterly intendeth to destroy the Church of England, and the Ministers of the same, as yee know so well as we: but also the faide Council hath robbed & spoiled, and further intendeth vtterly to robbe and spoile the whole body of the Kings Realme, and that as well all you, as vs, if God of his infinite mercy had not caused such as hath taken, and hereafter shall take this pilgrimage vpon them to proceede in the same: and whether all these things be true or not, we put it to your conscience. And if yee thinke it bee true, and fight against vs, which intendeth the Comen wealth of this Realme, and nothing else, we trust ye shall haue smal speed: For this pilgrimage we haue taken hyt for the preferation of Crysts Church of this Realme of England, the King our Soueraigne Lord the Nobility, Barony and Commons of the same, and to the intent to make petition to the Kings Highnesse for reformation of that which is amisse within this his Realme. And for punishment of Hereticks & Subverters of Lawes; and neither for money, malice, nor displeasure to any person, but such as be not worthy to remaine neere the King our Soueraigne Lords person. And further we know if yee should obtaine as we trust yn God ye shall nat, then ye put both vs and you, your heires and ours in bondage for euer: and further yee are sure of the interdiction of Crysts curse, and we clere, and out of the same: And yf wee overcome you, yee shall be in our wyls: wherefore for a conclusion, if you will not comen with vs for a reformation of the Premises, we certifie you by this our writing that we will feyght and dye, both against you, and all those that shalbe about wards to stoppe vs in the faide pilgrimage: And then God shall hem his Grace and mercy therein: And then yee ye shall be iudged hereafter to be shedders of some of Cryflyn blood, and defileers of your own Cryflyn. From Robert Aske chiefe Capitaine of the Comynalty assembled in pilgrimage, For the Barony and Comynalty of the same.

By mee Robert Aske yn the name of all the Comynalty and Barony.

Offsuch terrour and haughty spirit was this Capitaine Aske, that when Lancafter an Herald at Armes, was sent to declare the Kings mesfage in Pomfret Cattle (which the Rebels had got by surrender from the Lord Darcy) hee so bluffed out his answers, that the daunted man excusing himselfe to bee but a messenger, fell before him on his knees; till the Archbishop of Yorke tooke him vp, saying, it was not becoming the Coate hee wore, to prostrate to any, but only to his Soueraigne. Reade likewise if you please this strange Mandate from some meane man among them; the false suggestion that they possessed the ignorant with, and the Oath wherunto these holy Pilgrimes were fworne, as I finde them recorded by themfelues in these very words.

To the Commyns of Hawkefide parish Bailiffs, or Constables, with all the Hamlets of the same.

Welbeloued we greet you well, and whereas our brother Poverly, and our brother Rogers, goith forward, is openly for the aide & assistance of your faith, and holy Church, and for the reformation of such Abbeys and Monasteries, now dissolved and suppressed without any iust cause. Wherefore guddle brethers, Forasmuch as our sayd brether hath sent to us for ayde and helpe, wee doe not only effectually desire you, but also under the paine of deadly sinne wee commaunde you, and euery of you, to bee at the stoke Greene beside Hawkefide-kirke, the Saturday next being the xxvij. day of October by xi. of the Clocke, in your best array: as you will make answer before the heigh Iudge at the dreadfull day of Dome, and in the payne of pulling downe your Houses, and leasing of your guddes, and your bodies to be at the Captayns will: For at the place aforesaid, then and there, yee and we, shall take further direction concerning our faith, so farre decayed. And for guddle and laudable Customes of the Country, And such naughty inventions and strange Articles now accepted and admitted, so that our said brother bee subdued, they are lyke to goe furthwards to utter vndoing of the Commynwells.

(97) And the more to drawe forward the rude multitude which were forward enough of themfelues, they fet forth in writing these slanderous vnttruths against the King.

1 The first is that no infant shall receyue the blessed Sacrament of Baptisme, bott onlesse an trybett to bee payd to the King.

2 The second is that no man vnder xxi. Landes shall cyte no brede made of Wheate, ner Capon, chekyn, gois, ner pigge, bott onlesse to pay a trybett to the King.

3 The third is that for euery ploghe land the King will haue en trybett, with other diuerse extreme vrgent causes, and hertely fare ye well.

The Oath of the holy Pilgrimes.

Ye shall not enter into this our Pilgrimage of Grace for the Commynwells, but only for the loue that you doe bere vnto Almighty Godde, his faith, and to holy Church militant, the maintenance thereof, to the preservation of the Kings person, his issue, to the purifying of Nobilitie, and to expulse all vilanye blode, and euill Counsellors against the Commynwells, from his Grace and the priue Counsell of the same, and that ye shall not enter into oure said Pilgrimage, for no particular proffite to your selfe, nor to doe no displeasure to no pryncy person, but by Coun-cell for the Commynwells, ner see, ner murder for no enye, but in your herits put away all feare and dread, and take afore you the Crosse of Criste, and in your herits his faith, the restitution of the Church, the suppression of these Heretykes, and their oppnyons, by all the helle contents of this Booke.

And for the obseruation of this Oath, heare another commande of the Commissioners, as we find it recorded.

To the Bayliffes and Communes of the Towne of Skarboro.

Welbelouyd, we Francis Bygod Knyghte, and Iohn Halom yoman, in the name of all the Communes, commande and charde you, that ye assemble your selues together medietely upon receypte hereof, and so take this othe wchys we here send vnto you, and then after in all haste possible to assist and hayde theis overbrethern, wome wee sende to you to keepe, and make sure the Castell, Towne, and Port of Skarboro, that no man enter into the same Castell, that belongs vnto Rafe Ewers the younger Knyghte, nor any other whiches did not take full parte with the Communes, at ouer first and last assemblynge in whos name, auctorithy, or attorney fouer they come, vnlesse they haue licence of all the communes, in like manner yee shall truly keepe all suchs or dinance, and shippe to the vse of the Communes, wythe wyches wee charde you at our late being here, and thys not to faile, upon payne of yower lyes, yee shall reuer credence vnto this meffengeres, thus in hast: Fare ye well, from Settrynton this Mondaye Sancte Matris daye.

Francis Bigott Knight in the name, and by Commandement of all the Communes.

Against these rout of Rebels, George Earle of Shrewsbury, not staying for the Kings commission mustred his men, middeemed of many, that he meant to be a Pilgrime himselfe, vnto which susceptor hee made a loyall Oration, disclaiming all intencion against their attempts, how colourable so euer they laid their pretence; which done he caused his Chaplen to minister him an Oath of his loyaltie, before them in the Field: It was likewise reported that the Earle of Darby was set forward towards them, whome the Pilgrimes well hoped would haue sided with them, as by their mandate sent to the Brethren appeares, where is forbid that none of them should aide him, vnlesse he tooke the Oath: which he neuer meant to assay or fwere to.

(98) But true it is the King sent Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Lord General against them, accompanied with the Marquess of Excester, the Earles of Huntingdon and Rutland; who ioining their powers made towards Doncafter, where the Rebels then lay in their Randiuou; in whose sight immediately they fet vp their Tents, and determined battell vpon the next day; but on the night betwix, such floods of water fell, that the river Dun overflowed his bancke, and admitted no passage over the Bridge, which thing was taken as a token from God, and thereupon the Lord General offered them Conference, aliecing that the King was tender of his Subjects liues, and very vnnwilling to shed Christian blood: that their cause should be fauourably heard, and iust complaints redressed, if with submission and duty of Subjects, they would yeeld themfelues & affaires to the Kings mercy; that this their rebellious proceedings, was not only the forerunning messenger of destruction to themfelues and partakers, but gaue also a great aduantage vnto the Scots, the dangerous enemy vnto the Land, and them all: with these and the like petiswans the matter was so forwarded, that a conference was appointed at Doncafter, and foure pledges were sent from the Lord General vnto the

An Answer to the demands of the Rebels in Yorkefshyre, by the Kings Highnesse.

B b b b b

First

First, as touching the maintenance of the Faith, the termes bee so general, that it would bee very hard to make certaine answer to the same; but if they meane the faith of Christ, to the which all Christen men bee wonly bound: wee declare and protest our selfe to be that Prince, that doth entend, and hath alwayes minded to liue and die in the maintenance, defence, [and] obseruation [and] purity of the same. And that no man can or dare let his foote by vs in prouing of the contrary. Maruelling therefore much that ignorant people would goe about to take vpon them to instruct and teach vs (which hath beene noted [to be] learned) what the faith should be: [And also that they being ignorant people bee so presumptuous (seeing that wee and our hole Clergy in Consecration hath in Articles declared it) would take vpon them to correct vs all therein.] Or that they would bee to ingrate and vnnatural towards vs their most rightfull King, and naturall Soueraigne Lord, without any our desert, vpon false reports or surmises to suspect vs of the same, and giue rather credence to forged light tales, then to the very truth by vs these twenty eight yeeres vsed, and by our deedes approued.

To the second which toucheth the maintenance of the Church, and the liberties of the same we say it is so general a proposition that without distinctions no man with trouth can answer it, neither by Gods lawes, nor by the lawes of the Realme. For first, the Church which they mean must be known: Second, whether those things which they call liberties, and say they would maintaine, be things lawfull and beneficiall to the [Princes] common wealth, or otherwise. And these knowne wee doubt not but they shall be answered according to Gods law, equity and iustice. Neuerthelesse for all their generality this wee dare affirme, that (meaning what Church they list) Wee haue done nothing that may not be aciden by, both by Gods lawes and mans lawes, or that is prejudiciall to our common wealth, if our proceedings may be indifferently considered. And in our owne Church of England, where of wee be the supreme head on Earth, we haue done nothing so [extremely] and [as many of our Predecessors haue done, vpon much lesser grounds. Wherefore fithens this Article pertaineth nothing to any of our Commons, nor that they beare any thing therein, we cannot but reckon a great vnkindnesse and vnnaturalnesse in them, which had leuer a Chorde or twaine should enioy those profits of their Monasteries, for the supportation and maintenance of abominable life, then that we their Prince should recieue the same towards our extreme charges, doon, [and] daily sustained for their defence against forraigne enemies.

The third Article toucheth three things; the first is the lawes, the second is the common-wealth, the third, the directors of the lawes vnder vs. Touching the Lawes, as it becometh not blind men to iudge any colours, nee take vpon them to be iudges of the same: so wee dare expressly and boldly affirme as a thing that may bee easily and duely proued; that there were neuer in any One of our Predecessors dayes, so many wholesome, commodious and beneficiall Acts made for the common wealth, as haue bin made in our time, & fithens some of them had [experience] & doing [in the world,] that would now [perchance] [gain] pycke them thanke without desert. For our Lord forbids that both wee and our Council should haue lost so much time, as not to know better now then we did in the beginning of our raigne; what were a Common-wealth, and what were against the good and commodity of the same, seeing wee haue bene a King these twenty eight yeeres, and by experience learned the perfitnesse thereof: and although the folly and vnkindnesse of some will not perchance let them so knowledge it, yet wee trust and doubt not, but the most part of our louing Subjects speciallie, those which bee not seduced by false reports, doe both thinke it, accept it, and finde it so. Now touching the Common wealth, what King hath kept his Subjects so long in wealth and peace, so long without taking or doing wrong one to another; so indifferently ministred iustice to all estates both high and low; so defended them from all outward enemies: so fortified the frontiers of his Realme to his no little, and in manner inestimable charges, and all for their wealth and sureties? What King hath giuen among his Subjects moe generall or freer pardons? What King hath bene lother to punish his Subjects, or shewed more mercy among them? these things being so true, as no true man can deny them: It is an vnnatural and an vnkind demeanour of you our Subjects to beleue or deeme the contrary of it: by whose report fouer it should be set forth against vs. And the beginning of our raigne, where it is said that so many Noblemen were Counsellors: we doe not forget who were then Counsellors: for of the Temporality there were but two worthy to bee called Noble, the oon, the Treasurer of England, the other the high Steward of our household. Others, as the Lord Armer and Darcy but [cant wel] born

Gentlemen, [and] yet of no great lands, till they were promoted by vs, and so made Knights and Lords; the rest were Lawyers and Priests, sauing the two Bishops of Canterbury and Winchester: If these then bee the great number of Noblemen, that is spoken off, and that our Subjects seemed then contented withall, why then bee they not now much better contented with vs, which haue so many Nobles indeed, both of birth and condition of our Council. For first of the Temporality in our Priuy Council, wee haue the Duke of Norfolke, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess of Excester, the Lord Steward (when hee is present) the Earle of Oxford, the Earle of Suffex, the Lord Sandes our Chamberlain, the Lord Admiral Treasurer of our house: Sir William Paules Comptroller of our house. And of the Spiritualitie, the Bishops of Canterbury, Winchester, Hereford, and Gloucester: And for because it is more then necessary to haue some in our Priuy Council lemyd in our laws, and parts of the world: wee by the aduise of our hole Council asforesayd, haue delect and choise into our Priue Counsell, and also into their roomes our Chancellor and Priue Cell, thinking them men in all our opinion, most meetest for the same roomes; and wee with our hole Council thinke it right strange, that yee, which bee but brutes, and inexpert folke, doe take vpon you to appoint vs, who bee meet for our Counsell and hoo bee not. [Now therefore now how these feditious persons which how farre be thus wrongfully haue borne you thus in hand haue these folke abused you.] Ions abused, that reckon there were then moe Noblemen in our Priuy Council then be now: but yet thogh of our great clemency & princely goodnes, we declare now the truth, to pull our Subjects from that error and blindnesse they were led and trained into, by false and vntrue surmise and report: Wee would againe that euery of them knew, that it appertaineth not to any Subject, to presume to take vpon him, the appointment of his King and Soueraigne Lords Council. Ne for our part wee will take any such thing at any of our Subjects hands. Wherefore wee would that from henceforth they should better remember the duties of good Subjects towards their naturall Liege Lord, and meddle no further of those or such like things, as they haue nothing to doe withall.

To the fourth Article, where the Commons doe name

name certaine of our Council to be subverters both of Gods law, and the lawes of this Realme: Wee doe take and repute them as iust and true Executors both of Gods Lawes, and as ferre as their Commissions vnder vs doe extend. And if any of our Subjects can duely prouoe the contrary wee shall proceede against them and all other offenders therein, according to iustice, as to our estate and dignity royal doth appertaine. And in case it be but a false and an vntrue report, as we verily thinke it is, then it were as meet and standeth allwell with iustice, that they should haue the selfe same punishment, which wrongfully hath objected this to them, that they should haue had, if they had deserued it. And oon thing among others causeth vs to thinke that this slander should bee vntrue, because it proceedeth from that place, which is both farre distant from that where they inhabite, and also from those people which neuer heard them preach, nor yet knoweth any part of their conuersation. Wherefore we exhorte all ye our Commons to be no more so light of credit in the beleueing of yuel things spoken of vs your naturall Prince and Soueraigne Lord: Nor of any of our Prelates and Counsaillers, but to thinke that your King hauing so long reigned ouer you with the aduise of his Counsell hath as good discretion to elect and chuse his Counsaillers, as thoe who so euer they bee that hath put this in your heads or yee other being but ignorant people and ought off all experyens off pryinces affaires.

Here in this final point which yee our Comens of Tokeshire, Westmerland, Cumberland, the Bishopricke of Durham, Richmondshire, Crauen, Dent, Sedbarre, and all other places that haue bene seduced to this lussurellion doe desire; and also in the matter of the whole discourse of your Petitions. We verily thinke that the rest of all our hole Comens of many Countreys to whom you be in manner but an handfull, will greatly disdain and not beare it, that you take vpon you to set order to vs and them, and specially to vs being Soueraigne Lord to you both:

[you being rebeller.] And that because you be rebells, you would make them as bearers and pertakers of your mischief, willing them to take perdon for Insurrections which verelie we thinke and doubt not they neuer minded: but like true Subjects to the contrary haue both with heart and deede been ready at our call to defend both vs and themselves: and now for our part as to your demands, we let you wit, that perdon of such things as you demaund lyeth onely in the will and pleasure of the Prince: but it seemeth by your lewde proclamations and false conductes, that there becomings you which take vpon them both: the parts of Kings and Counsaillers. Which neither by vs nor by the General content of our Realme hath been admitted to any such roome. What arrogancie is then in those wretches being also of none experience, to presume to raise you our Subjects without Commission or authoritie: yee and against vs vnder a cloked colour of your wealth and in our name, and as the successe and ende would declare if wee should not be more mercifull vnto you then you haue deserued to your owne vtter confusions. Wherefore wee late all you our said Subjects againe wit, that were it not that our Princely heart cannot reckon this your shamefull insurrection and most ingrate and vnatural rebellion to bee done of malice or rancour, but rather by a lightnesse giuen in manner by a naughty nature to a Commonality, and a wondrous sudden surreption of Gentlemen: We must needs haue executed an other maner of punishment, then if you will humbly knowledge your fault, and submit your selfe to our mercie, wee intend to doe [as by our proclamations we doe might yee be informed.]

Fynys.

The effect that the Kings reply wrought, is manifest by his free pardons sent vnto the offenders, by Proclamation diuulged by his messenger at Armes and his trumpet throughout the North parts, the tenour wherof from the Originall is as followeth:

Allbee yt, that yowe the Kings Subjects and Commons dwelling and inhabiting in the Shires of Torke, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland, the Bishopricke of Durham, the City of Torke, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Kyngston upon Hull, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Newcastle upon Tyne, and the Shire of the same, and in other Shires, Towns, Dales, Places, privileged, the Franchises and Liberties within the limits of the said Shires, Cities, and Townes, or any of them, or being reputed or taken for any part, parcell, number of any of them, and such other the Kings said Subjects, inhabiting in the Towne of Lancaster, or elsewhere, by North, in the Shire of Lancaster, haue now of late attempted and committed manifest and open rebellion, against his most royall Maiesty, whereby was like to haue ensuewed, the utter rewin and destruction of these hole Countreys, to the grete comforte and auancement of your ancient enemies the Scots, which as his Hienes credably enforced, doe with a great Redmes waite vpon the same, and to the high displeasure of God, who streitly commandeth you to obey your Soueraigne Lord and Kings in all things, and not with violence to resist his will or Commandement, for anie cause whatsoeuer it be: Neuerthelesse the Kings roiall Magestie, perceling as well by the Articles of their partners sent to his Hienes: As also dewly enforced by credible reports, that their said offences proceeded of ignorance, and by occasion of fundrie false talis neuer minded or intended by his Hienes, or any of his Council, but most craftely contriued, and most spitefully set abroade amongst you, by certain malicious and feditious persons; and thereupon his Hignes inclined to extend his most gracious mercy and pity towards you, hauing chefe charge of you vnder God, both of your sowles and bodies, and desiring rather the preservation of the same, and your reconciliation, by his mercifull meyns, than by the order and rigour of Iustice to punish you according to your demerits, of his inestimable goodnes, benignity, mercy, and pity, and at your most humble petitions and submissions made vnto his Hignes, hee is content & pleased to giue and grant, and by his present Proclamation doth giue & grant vnto you al, and to al & euery your confederates whosoever they dwell, of estate, degree, or what condition soeuer they be, or by what name or names soeuer they or you be, or may bee called, his Generall and free pardon for all manner of treasons, rebellions, insurrections, misprisions of treasons, murders, robberies, felonies, and of al offences of the same, and of euery of them, unlawfull assemblies, unlawfull Conuenticles, unlawfull speaking of wordes, confederacies, riots, rowts: And all other trespasses, offences and contemptes, done and committed by you, or anie of you against the Kings Magestie, his Crowne or dignitie royal, within and from the time of the beginning of the said Rebellion whensoeuer it was, vnto the present day of proclaiming of this Proclamation, and of all paines, iudgements, and executions, of death, and all other penalties, forfeitures, fines, and forfeitures of Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods or Catells by any of your forfeitures incurred by reason of the premises, or any of them; which Fines, Forfeitures, Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods, and Catells, the Kings said Hignes of his speciall grace, and mere motion by these presents, giueth to such of you, as haue or should haue forfeited, or loste the same, by occasion of the premises or any of them: And also his Hignes is pleased, and contented, that you and euery of you from time to time, shall and may haue vpon your fewtes to be made hereafter in his Chancery, his said and most gracious and free pardon vnder his great Seale concerning the premises, without any further Bill or Warrant to be obtained for the same, and without paying any thing for the great seale thereof: And that you and euery of you from time to time may freely and liberally serue for his said pardon, when and as often as it shall like you, without anie trouble, vexation or impeachment for

for the premisses, or anie of them, by his heires, or by anie his Officers, Ministers, or Subiects, by anie manner of means, or in anie manner of wise. Provided alwaies, that you and euery of you in token of a perfect declaration and knowledge, that ye doe hartlie lament and be sorrie for your said offences, shall make your humbly submission vnto his Highnes, in the presence of his right trustie and right intirely beloved Cofens and Concillars: the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Shrewsburie his Lieutenants Generall, or any of them, or to their Deputy or Deputies of them, or any of them, or such other person, or persons as the Kings Highnes shall appoint for the same: Furthermore the Kings most roiall Magesty, fireitely chargeth and commandeth, that you and euery of you, shall from henceforth, like true and faithfull Subiects use your felues, in Gods peace, and his, according to the duties of allegiance, and that you shall in no wise hereafter, attempt to make or procure, any such rebellion, intent, unlawfull Assemblies, Riots, Rowts, and Conspirations, nor at the Commandement, nor by the Authority of any person, of what estate or degree, or for what cause soeuer it be, shall arise in any forcible manner, and array, vnto it be at the speciall commandement of the Kings Highnes, or his Lieutenant sufficiently authorized for the same. In witness whereof the King most roiall Magesty, hath caused this his Proclamation to be made Patent, and sealed with his great sayle at Richemonte the 1 X. day of December in the XX V I I I. yeere of his Reigne. 1536.

Excell.

Notwithstanding this Generall pardon and mercifull dealings of the King a new Insurrection was raised in the North, wherein many of the former were now againe Actors, as by name Robert Aske whom the King had not onely pardoned, but also highly rewarded, the Lord Dacres, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bygod, Pulmer, Percy, Hamilton, Tempest and Lumley, all of them put to death, as they well deserved.

(92) In which Commotions those men whose profession was onely the Booke and their Beades, mistaking Christs meanings, who bad his Disciples to sell their coats, and to buy a sword, came armed among the Rebels into the Field, and with them were taken as Traitors against the Crowne: for which offence many of them suffered death: namely, John Passlew Abbot of Whaley in Lincolneshire, John Casteigate and William Haydocke Monks of the same houle, Robert Hobbs Abbot of Woborne in Bedfordshire, Adam Sudbury Abbot of Gernaux with Asbeed a Monke of that houle; the Abbot of Sawley in Lancashire and the Prior of the same place, William Wold Prior of Birlington, the Parson of Pudington, sixe Priests of Lincolneshire, and with them their chieftaine, Captaine Collier, and John Allen Priest.

(100) These stirres thus quieted and the Statesmen at leasure to prevent the like, a Commission came forth to purge the Churches of Idols; and to suppress the Monasteries to the Kings vse, granted vnto him by Parliament: the one of them, the onely working cause, through the gaine that was got by ignorant deuotion, and gadding on pilgrimage, and the other, the Nest and very receptacle of all traitorous attempters, against the peace of the Land and Supremacy of the Crowne. The abuse of the first was solemnly shewed at Pauls Crosse in London, vpon Sunday the twenty foure of February, by Doctor John Fisher Bishop of Rocheester, where the Roode of Boxley in Kent, commonly called the Roode of Grace, made with diuers vices to bow downe and to life vp it selfe, to shake, and to stirre both Heads, hands, and feet, to rowle the eies, moue the lippes and to bend the browes; was then broken and pulled in peeces. So likewise the Images of our Lady of Walsingham and Ipwich, let and be sprinkled with Iewels, and Gemmes, with diuers others both of England and Wales; were brought to London and burnt at Chelsey before the Lord Cromwell. Then the Axes of the hewers began to cast downe the walles of all

Monasteries, whose number (as Cambden doth account them) were sixe hundred forty sixe, besides fourscore and tenne Colledges, them of Oxford and Cambridge not accounted: of Hospitalls one hundred and tenne, and of Chauntries and free Chapels two thousand, three hundred, feutyenty four, all of them almost were then borne downe with the sudden deluge of those tempestuous times, whilst the world stood amazed, King Henric proceeded, and the Clergy men groaned vnder their owne destructions; among these the Shrine of Thomas Becket was defaced, which did abound with more then Princely riches: whose meanest part was pure gold, garnished with many precious stones, as Erasmus that saw it, hath written, whereof the chieftest was a rich Gemme of France, offered by King Lewis, who asked and obtained (you may be sure, he buying it so deare) that no passenger betwixt Douer and White-sand should perish by shipwracke; his bones by Stephen Langton had bene laide in a golden Shrine, his name canonized, and the day of his death made annually holy, such concourse of Pilgrime, such pressing to touch him, and such creeping and kneeling to his Tombe, that the prints of their deuotion in the Marble stones, remains to this day; euery Pillar rebounding the miracles of this reputed Martyre, and the Church it selfe dedicated to Christ, forced to giue place to the name of Saint Thomas. The Timber worke of this Shrine was covered with plates of gold, damasked and embossed with wires of gold, garnished with broches, images, angels, precious stones, and chert Orient Pearles: all these defaced filled two Chests and were for price of an vntimable value. But in steede of these Dagons, the Bible in English was commanded to be read in all Churches, and Register Bookes of weddings, Christenings and Burials in euery of them to be kept.

(101) The yearly reuenues of these, as they were valued by the Commissioners, at their subuersions amounted to an vntimable summe, as appeareth by the Original Booke it selfe presented to the King, whereof more shall be spoken in the end of this chapter, and yet most of them rated at Robins-hoods penny-worthes, what their rents were, a libell scattered abroad, and read to the king, by demonstration did proue, wherein was accounted, that vnto the sixe Orders of Friars, (euery householder paying them sixe pence the Quarter) the summe of fourey three thousand, three hundred, thirty three pound, sixe shillings and eight pence sterling, was paid them by yeere, besides the reuenues of their owne lands, which was not a little, so that not without cause many entred into a Monasticall life, rather to liue at full, and without cares of this world, then to feede the flocke of Christ, or to winne them, and not theirs, after the example of the Apostle. For the Testament of Christ, was vnto most of these, as a booke sealed with seauen seales, and their mouths vnmuzzled they did deuoure, but not tread out the Corne, so that the Sunne by their doctrine seemed to be darkened, as with smoke, and themselves to be the Locusts that ouerspread the superficies of the Earth, whose faces were like men, pretending humanity, their haire like women in shew of modesty, their Crownes of counterfeited gould, signifying their vntimely authoritie, their teeth like Lyons shewing their Tyrannie, their force like horses prepared for battell, their habergions of Iron betokening their strength, the found of their wings, the thundering out their mandates like to the rumbling of Chariots in warre, their Tailles (the false Prophets) having stings like vnto Scorpions, and their King the bad Abaddon, even the Angell of the Bottomlesse pit. All those allusions most aptly fitting these Cloistered Friars, who now grown to the height of their sinnes, their skirts were discovered, that their shame might appeare; being the only men then laid open to the world.

thers in other forreine parts) two in the daies of K. Henry the fourth, the first English King that put anie to death for the doctrine of Rome; (omitting Sir John Oldcastle and others, that died for the Gospels defence, in the daies of King Henry the fifth) foure in the raigne of innocent Henric the sixth. One in the daies of King Edward the fourth, and tenne in the time of King Henry the seventh, sealed the doctrine against the papall religion with their blood; all of them being martyred before that Martin Luther wrote. And in the raigne of this King twenty sixe suffered the fire, before the flames thereof could be quenched, which a while was done by the means of good Queene Anne, till afterwards they mounted higher, when the six Articles were made: but because this Ecclesiastick text is handled elsewhere, and seemeth vnforcible to our begunne Subiect, we will referre the Reader for these matters vnto the industrious paines of that worthy and euer venerable man M. Fox, taken in his Acts & Monuments of Ecclesiasticall history.

(103) The Monasteries thus dissolved, and the Reuenues thereof conuerted to temporall vses, King Henry ranne in great obloquie of many forraigne Potentates, but most especially of the Pope; who with Cardinall Pole instituted diuers Princes in Christendom to inuade England thus fallen from his faith: Yea, & home-borne Subiects disliking the courie for Papisticall subuersion, by secret working sought to depriue King Henry, and to raise vp Reynold Pole vnto the Regall dignity, as by their indentments appeareth. The persons conuicted, were Lord Henry Courtney Marquess of Excester, & Earle of Deuonshire, the sonne of Lady Katherine, the sixteenth daughter of King Edward the fourth: Henric Poole Lord Montacute, with Sir Geoffrey his brother, and Sir Edward Neuill brother to the Lord of Abergauenny. These Poles were the sonnes of Lady Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the onely daughter of George Duke of Clarence: and of these Reynold Poole once Deane of Excester, and now Cardinall at Rome was accounted the onely man.

(104) And this foresaid Lord Marquess had formerly bene in such fauour with King Henry, that at his going into France he ordained him his Heire apparant, though at his returne vpon graue deliberation, hee saw it better policy to plucke him downe then was vsed in setting him vp, left in acting his part vpon that infectiue stage, hee put the land to as much trouble as the arraigned Duke Richard of York had done, after hee was ordained heire apparant, which Title produced the Tragedy of his raier King Henry the sixth, and now hauing him and his Abettors vpon the aduantage, the better to secure his owne Estate, hee caused the heades of this Lord Marquess with the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Neuill to be cut off vpon Tower-hill.

(105) The King then a Widower, since the death of Queene Jane, who departed this life two yeeres before, meant to maintaine what hee had done, maugre all opposites: which the better to effect, by the Counsell of Lord Cromwell, he sought and obtained the alliance of the Princes of Germany, and heard the motion for marriage with the Lady Anne sister to William Duke of Cleue, whose other sister Fredericke Duke of Saxony had espoused a great fauourer of the Gospel, and maintainer of Martin Luther the zealous Preacher and professor thereof. But whether for the death of Anne Bullen, or that hee would haue his wifes sister bestowed neerer at home (which thing hee pretended) a great hinderer hee was of that match. But the Lady sent into England, and married vnto King Henry, seemed nothing pleasing in his eye; which Stephen Gardiner then Bishoppe of Winchester perceiving, thought it a fite subiect for him to worke vpon, against the Lord Cromwell the maker of the match; hee therefore instigated ieaousies dayly into the Kings care, first exasperating the hatred of the Princes of Germa- ny to him-wards, and especially of Duke Fredericke his compulsiue brother in Law, the Emperor, French Kings, Scots and the Pope, all seeking at once to raise their powers against England. The ciuill tumults lately passed, and new commotions greatly to be feared, hee letted not to remember, and all to nip the spring of the new spreading Gospel, whereby this wife Politician in the end got fix such Articles against it, as the Consistory of Hell could deuise no worse. Whose cruelties were such that not long after, and in the daies of this King, some of those Acts were againe repealed, and some of them qualified, as too sharpe and searching into the blood of the Kings best Subiects.

(106) The fruite of these bloud-thirsty instigators, the Lord Cromwell, and Lady Anne of Cleue soon tasted of, he by imprisonment and death, and she by disgrace and diuorce; hauing been his wife from Ianuary to Iune, in all which time the King refrained the mutual knowledge of her body, for the dislike hee had of her person, euen at the first sight, as himselfe called to witness the Lord Cromwell then Prisoner in the Tower, for whose report hee wrote a Letter with his owne hand; and these good Lady no other cause alleadged, was diuorced by Parliament, when also it was enacted that shee should no longer bee styled Queene. The Lord Cromwell was charged by the Lord Rich, and Sir George Throgmorton with speaking of certaine generall words, not excepting therein the Kings person, which neuerthelesse were thought so sleight and insufficient to take away his life, that his enemies feared to put it to the trial of his Peeres, lest he should be acquitted by them, as the Lord Dacres of the North not many yeeres before had bene; wherefore there was a Bill drawne to attaine him of heresie and Treason, in generall words, rather then in particular proofes, which when hee was dead, passed in both houses of Parliament with the Kings assent.

(107) Howbeit Saunders that seldome speaks well of the Gospels professors, will haue him to die for the breach of a Law made by himselfe, which was, that one appeached of treason, should not come in the Kings presence, till hee had tried himselfe not guilty; but besides that wee find no such Act by him made: his inditement doth not charge him with treason, but with setting at liberty certain persons committed for misprision of treason and heresie, for fauouring and maintaining the translation of hereticall bookes into English; for bearing out Barnes and other hereticall Preachers; that himselfe was an heretike, and had spoken words, great words for the vpholding of his said religion, which were, that the King should not change it if hee would: for these things hee was attained by Parliament of high Treason, and that grounded either vpon a Statute made in the five and twenty of Edward the third, or else by the explanation of that Act which referreth the exposition of Treasons to the Parliament, and so no way did Cromwell deuise or make any law of treason, which himselfe first fell into, as that partiall Romanist hath said.

(108) But most sure it is, that the Kings affection, altogether guided by the fairest obiect, found no other point in the Compass to fixe his variable eye, besides that onely, which by his seeming was touched by the Loadstone of nature, and the same to bee the Lady Katherine Howard, daughter to Edward the brother of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, against whom Cromwell standing in the defence of Queene Anne, and vying words of dislike in the Lady Katherine, distastfull vnto the King, was thereupon apprehended (his enemy so working) and vpon the twenty eight of Iuly suffered death with the stroke of the Axe vpon Tower-hill, with whom was beheaded the Lord Hungerford of Hillesbery, neither lo Christianly suffering, nor lo quietly dying for his offence committed against nature.

And the Lord Leonard Gray in this present yeere lost his head for treason, the twenty eight of June. And the next day following Thomas Eines Lord Dacres of the South, died at Tyburne for killing a priuate man in a fray. Neither was it put vntill that the heades of Queen Katherine Howard, and the Lady Jane Rochford were stricken off, the one for Adultery, the other for concealment, as was alleaged, the parties offending were Francis Dereham, and Thomas Culpepper, Dereham before thee was Queene, and Culpepper after, who both were executed at Tyburne, the tenth of December, and the twelfth of February following, Mistresse Katherine Howard (for so in the Act of her Attainure shee is called) who had bene titled and receiued Queene for the space of fixe months, and foure dayes, with the Lady Jane then widow, and late wife vnto George Bullen, Lord Rochford, were both of them brought vnto a Scaffold raised vpon the hill within the Tower, wherethey in lamentable passions suffered death.

(110) Howsoever those times afforded such Queene to the Kings bed, or himselfe vnfourunate in making his choise: yet many of no meane iudgement haue rather accused King Henry for his changing and variable affections, then thinke them guilty in the breach of Matrimony. Of Anne wee haue seene what hath bene said, and of this Queene let vs heare what shee protested after her condemnation to Doctor White Bishoppe of Winchester her last Confessor, and by him deliuered to a noble young Lord of her name, and neere alliance: Her words were these: As to the Act my reuerend Lord for which I stand condemned, God and his holy Angels I take to witnesse vpon my soules saluation, that I die guiltlesse, neuer hauing so abused my Soueraignes bed: what other finnes and follies of youth I haue committed, I will not excuse; but am assured that for these, God hath brought this punishment vpon me, and will in his mercy remit them, for which I pray you, pray with me, vnto his sonne and my sauour Christ.

(111) As these then in case of Treasons eyther acted or intended, ended their liues; so others in case of conscience (though diuersly affected) came to their deaths, and that by force of the Statutes enacted vnder this King; whereof one was the abolishing of the Pope, and the oath of Supremacy, the refusers of either made offenders in state of high Treason, and the other in case of religion, when the sixe Articles enacted by Parliament, was made Hereticke and death, to such as held or taught the contrary, which Articles were thus concluded in both the houses of Parliament with consent of the King.

1 That after the words of consecration spoken by the Priest, the reall and naturall body and blood of Christ, as hee was conceived and crucified, was in the Sacrament, and no other substance consisting, in the forme of bread and wine, besides the substance of Christ God and man.

2 That the communion in both kinds was not necessarie vnto saluation, the flesh onely in forme of bread, sufficient for the Laity.

3 That Priests after they haue receiued orders might not marry by the law of God.

4 That the vowes of chastity either in man or woman, ought by Gods law to be obserued, and by which they are exempted from other liberties of Christian people.

5 That priuate Masses was necessary for the people, and agreeable to the law of God.

6 That a iurial confession was expedient to be retained, and continued in the Church of God.

These Statutes I lay aswell the one as the other, brought many to their ends, which otherwise were very good Subiects, and worthy instruments in the common weale: for offending in the first, there died Bishoppe Fisher, and Sir Thomas More, besides many Abbots, Priors, and Friars, and among them, in Smithfield the Welsh rode set Frier Forrest on fire, according to the prophesy very rife in their mouths, that this holy rode should set a whole forest on fire. For the other suffered in flames, many godly Christians, whereof Robert Barnes a reuerend Doctor, and worthy minister of Christ, the first reducer (as M. Fox reporteth) of the Vniuersity of Cambridge from rudenesse and barbarity vnto good literature and learning, was with the first: And Anne Askew a Gentlewoman of an incomparable dexterity one of the last, who, about the weaknesse of her sexe most valiantly stood against the violence of the time.

(112) Her birth was worshipfull, and education accordingly, bestowed in marriage, vnto John Kyme a Gentleman in *Lincolne*shire, and commended by Bale for her rare wit, and elegant beauty; which her parts the penfull of X. D. with his vniuersal hand (euer ouerhard to shadow the truth,) hath slanderously blurred and measured those graces in her, by his owne loose affections, and those wanton Votaries, which in the height of sinne haue changed the naturall vye of women against nature.

This young heifer (saith hee) abiding no yoke, a coy dame, and of very euill fame, left the company of Maister Kyme, to gadde vp and downe a Gospelling, and Gosipping where shee might, and ought not, but especially in London, and neere the Court, now shee being faire and but twenty five yeeres old at her death, doth easily shew what may be suspected of her life, and the mystrical speeches and demands of the Kings Council touching her departure from her husband, were grounded vpon somewhat.

Thus farre this scandalizing man hath accused this holy Anne by the outward appearance of her youth and beauty: as holy Anna by Elis was accused of drunkennesse when her heart was most feruent, in supplications to her God, and his partiall pen made her fanne to sift the wheate of her holy conuerlation to finde out some chaffe, whereof none is free, nor is shee to be condemned vpon the imagerie of his suspicious head (who vndoubtedly would haue told all if any thing could haue bene found) whereas thee in the vigour of beauty and weaknesse of her Sexe, resistest the gaine-saiers of the truth with her dearest blood: testifying from the Prisons her faith and constancy, and from the Racke preached Christ, whereon most vnhumanely and against kind, shee was twice tormented; and lastly sealed her testimonie in Smithfield through the flames of fire: being borne to the place of her death in a Chaire, her bones so disioynted by the Racke that shee could not goe.

(113) The irreuerend X. D. whose affection to Christs Gospell and loyalty to the English Crowne hath sufficiently shewed it selfe, to make her no Martyr, and that her life did deserue the Racke, saith that the King himselfe commanded that torture to be inflicted, for infecting with her erroneous doctrine, his Court, his Nieces, Suffolkes daughters, and his Queene. Whereas the truth tels vs that the Lieutenant refusing to racke her the second time was threatened by Wriothesley Lord Chancellor (who did it himselfe) to bee complained of to the King, who immediately tooke Boate and told the whole Tragedy; whereof King Henrie seemed to be fore offended, for vsing a woman with such inhumane tortures. But such fauours had the Popes Chickens vnder the shroud of the Church and wing of this Monarch, that they feared not to follow the appeale of death, euen vpon her that slept in his owne bosome, which was Queene Katherine Parre, espoused vnto him some three yeeres before, and whom (as this this States intelligencer doth confesse) he meant to haue burned had he longer liued. For the truth is (saith hee) that the Kings sickness and death shortly ensuing was the chiefe cause of her escape, and the error of the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley, who let fall out of his bosome, the Kings hand and commission for carrying her to the Tower gave occasion (the paper found and brought her) to goe and humble her selfe to the King; the principal occasion against her was Heretical Books found in her closet, both brought forth by Anne Askew, whereof the twain were the Lady Herbert, Lady Jane, Lady Tyavitt, and others. Indeed it is true that by Gods providence such papers were let fall out of the Lord Chancellors bosome containing certain Articles against her, with a warrant to commit her to the Tower, whereunto the Kings hand was subscribed: which being found was presently brought vnto the Queene, whereof the vnexpected content so deeply touched her tender heart, that forthwith shee fell into great feares, laments, and a most heavy melancholy, and was in such danger of death, that the King came to visit her, hauing not gone forth of his Chamber of many dayes before; whereat shee so reioiced, as shee began to amend: and to acknowledge her like loue and duty, the next night following, repaired to the Kings Bed-chamber, accompanied onely with the Lady Herbert her sister, and the Lady Jane the Kings niece, carrying the Candle before her, of whose presence the King seemed to be most desirous; and presently falling in talke of Religion, began to debate some question thereof with the Queene, demanding to haue her resolutions therein, but shee knowing that his nature was not to be croft, and the forensell of his legge to encrease his choller, made him answer that she was a woman, accompanied with many imperfections, but his Maiestie wife and iudicious, of whom shee must learne as of her Lord and Head, for so God hath appointed her (saith shee) the Supreme Head of vs all, of whom next vnto him I will euer learne. Not so, by Saint Mary, said the King, you are become a Doctor Kate to instruct vs, and not to be instructed by vs as often heretofore we haue seene. Indeede (saith shee) if your Maiestie haue so concerned, I haue bene mistaken in my meaning, who haue euer held it preposterous for a woman to instruct her Lord. And whereas I haue heretofore held talke with your highnes touching Religion, it was to learne of your Maiestie some excellent point which my selfe stood in doubt of: and sometimes to the end that you might with lesse griefe passe ouer this painful time of your infirmity, wherein if by my ouermuch boldnesse I haue failed in the latter, yet haue I not done in the former, to my no small benefit and comfort. And is it euen so sweet heart? (quoth the King) why then, are we friends, and so kissing her, gaue her leaue to depart. But the day drawne on for her apprehension, and the King disposed to take the ayre, sent for the Queene to walke in the Garden, himselfe accompanied onely with two Gentlemen, and thee with the three foresaid Ladies. Whenas suddenly the Lord Chancellor with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden, with purpose to haue apprehended and carried the Queene to the Tower; whose malpert approach the King greatly misliked, and sternely beholding him, stepe aside, saluting him with the names of knaue, foole, and beast, bidding auant out of presence. The Queene seeing the King chased, but knew not the cause, indeauoured by all means to pacifie his Maiestie, and intreated for the Lord Chancellor, whose fault shee thought and alleaged, was rather through misimpression then will, and therefore, said shee, I will become a humble suiter for him vnto your Highnesse. Ah poore soule (quoth the King) thou little knowest Kate how euill the deserveth this grace at thy hands: of my word (sweet heart) hee hath bene towards thee a verie knaue. But in following this tract of blood, flowed from the fountaine of the sixe Articles, wee haue stepped ouer some other occurrences that happened somewhat before this time, vnto which with thy patience, good Reader, we will returne againe.

(114) King Henrie by order of Parliament hauing assumed the Stile and Title of King of Ireland, with the submission of most of the Irish Nobility, James his Nephew, King of Scotland, tooke it not well, for that, as Lisle saith, a great part of Ireland, especially in the North, had been in possession of the Scottishmen for many hundred of yeeres before. These discontentes conceiued, King Henrie well perceived; and because hee would haue no ill will, so neere him, that had so many enuiers abroad, he sent vnto King James that it would please him to repaire vnto the City of Torke, where he would meet him, to conferre for the wealth of both the Realmes, which at first was granted, but vpon better aduise, vnaccomplished, his Counsellors mouing the dangers; and his Clergy the feares, left their Religion should be changed to the offence of his confederates the Pope, the Emperour, and the French King.

(115) The vnkindnes growing from this small sparke, was presently kindled into great flames, for Commissioners being sent from both Kings, to view the limits of either Kingdome, they fell at odds about a small peece of ground, and from that tooke occasion of emulation and warres: to prosecute which King Henry prepared an Armie, and sent them into Scotland vnder the Conduct of the Duke of Norfolke, accompanied with the Earles of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus, and Rutland. These passing the English Marches, did much hurt in the Kingdome of Scotland. To witte whom King James gathered a power, of five and thirty strong, and at Fallowmore meant to haue bidden the Duke battell, which as that writer related, was not then minded to doe, but made againe into England, and passing the water Tweed, sustained great losse by the courageous pursuit of the Lord Huntly. King James vpon a lusty courage meaning to repaire the Scots losses with the English spoiles, was very forward to follow the Duke into their Borders, but the Scottish Nobility wifely waying the danger of warre, by no means would either assent, or assist him out of his owne kingdome, affirming it honour sufficient, to haue forced the English backe with no little losse.

(116) King James discontented at his Nobles denials, made towards the Borders himselfe, where, mouing the Lord Maxwell, Lord Warden of the West Borders, with many other men of special fauour and account, to invade England, whereunto they gaue their consents. These passing the River Eske, did some small damage vpon the Westerne Borderers, whereof Thomas Baltard Dacres, and Lacke of Musgrave, as Hollinshed calls them, sent word to Thomas Wharton, Lord Warden for the King vpon the West Marches: But the Scots coming forward, they were forced to prepare for fight before the Lord Wharton could come, and out of their smal company left a stand vpon the side of a hill.

(117) The Scots aduanced forward with no little hope, were presently danted with the sight of these men, and verily thought that the Lord Wharton had assembled his Charge, or that the Duke of Norfolke with a great Army were come to their rescue, whereupon they began to consult what was best to be done, and demanding who was deputed Lieutenant by the King, Oliuer Sinclair of no great parts nor honorable parentage, being lifted vp vpon the Shoulders of two Souldiers, shewed forth the Kings Commission, wherein himselfe was appointed their Generall, and whereat howsoever it was written or read, the Lords tooke no little disdain that so many more worthy, honourable, and approued Captaines of the Field, should be lead by this his Minion, but no Seruant of Mars. In whole contempt, and for the indirection of their King, they suffered themselves to be taken Prisoners, and willingly lost the daye.

(118) This victory was wonne vpon the twenty fourth fourth of November, at a place beyond Carliel, called Solem-moffe, where were taken Prisoners the Earles of Caillis and Glencarne, the Lords Maxwell, Flemming, Summerwell, Oliphant, and Grey, Sir Oliver Sinclair, and others, the number of one and twenty men of account, who were conveyed to London, and committed to the Tower. For griefe of which losse, and suspicion of his Nobility, King James fell into a melancholy Passion, which the birth of his new borne Prince rather increased, then gaue him any comfort, so as he deceased the fourteenth day of December following, forebiewing (faith Lejue) great troubles to follow in Scotland.

(119) Neves brought neere at one instant, of the death of King James, & birth of the Princesse his daughter, King Henry intended to doe that by the match of a marriage, which long had bene assayed by the sword of Mars: all things so confornting as it did, he hauing one onely sonne, then aboute fve yeres of age, and Scotland no heire beside this new borne daughter; their yeeres suiting a consent for marriage, the whole land offering both the ioynter and dowry, and that which most moued, their chiefe Nobility in his owne hands, to be moulded for this designe, as if heaven it selfe had bid the banes.

(120) Those Prisoners therefore which had remained in the Tower only two daies, vpon the twenty one of December, he sent for to Westminster, the Earles and Lords all suited in Gownes of blacke damaske, furred with Cunny, whereafter some words of friendly reproofe, they were bestowed among the English Nobility, who vsed them according to their estates: and the third day in Christmas were inuited to the Court at Greenwich, where they went before the King to his Chappell, were royally feasted, and the motion then made for the establishing of peace, by the Coniunction of the two Princes, whereunto the Scottish were as willing as the English, & proffered all forward assistance to haue it accomplished. So that these Nobles were deliuered without other ranfome, and richly rewarded at their departure from Court.

(121) These returned into Scotland, declared what they had done, and so effectually followed the busines, that in a Parliament assembled of the three Estates, the marriage was confirmed, and a peace proclaimed to continue betwixt the two Realmes the space of tenne yeeres, which agreements were sent into England by honourable Ambassadors, and there interchangeably sealed betwixt these Potent Estates. But Cardinall Beaton Archbishop of Saint Andrewes, fearing least Scotland would change the Church Orders, as England had done (the Bible already read in their owne language, and the Popes vsurped power called in Question, as then it began to be, by the feruent preaching of Frier Guiliam, to the great liking of most of the Lords) made some exceptions against the Earle Arraine the new chosen Gouvernour, and second person in the Land, being neere in blood to the young Queene. And the French King not liking this vnion with England, sought by all meanes to breake the same match: to effect which, he sent the Earle of Lennox to perswade with the Gouvernour, with great proffers and promises of assistance, but finding him faithfull vnto King Henry, presently made faction for the French, wherein he drew the Queene mother, the Earles Huntly, Argile, Montrose, Menteith, and many more Peeres, the Cardinall amongst them cuer the chiefe.

(122) Earle Lennox thus growne into credite with the Queene mother, and made strong by her adherents that fauoured the French, presently claimed to be Gouvernour of Scotland, being the second person of degree in the Realme, and withall to haue the custody of the young Queene, who with her mother were forthwith taken from Linlithgow vnder the charge of the Gouvernour Arraine, and brought vnto Strineling strongly guarded, with the continuall presence of the Lords, Lenningston, Erskein, Flemming, and Ruthwen, least Queene Mary should be conveyed into England vnto King Henry. These violent courtes, caused great Emulations among the Scottish Nobility, each of them sinding as their affections were seded, but lastly agree to let the Crowne on their young Queenes head: prepared for the solemnity, whereunto all the Lords came, excepting those that stood for England, and from them the Gouvernour with much ado, was drawne to be present at the Coronation: but that accomplished, and the state affaires consulted vpon, it was agreed that the French Kings suite should be fauoured, and that the Earle Arrain should be Gouvernour still, whereas Earle Lennox conceived such displeasure, as he became wholly for King Henry, & ioined himselfe with the Earles of Angus, Glencarne, and Caillis, the Lords, Maxwell, Summerwell, Gray, and others that stood with the English for the match with Prince Edward.

(123) King Henry then hearing what was done, and intended, sent presently into Scotland to demand the Custody of the young Queene, and that certaine Scottish Noblemen might be appointed to guard her in England, vntill she came to yeeres of consent, according to Covenants formerly concluded; which no waies would be granted, and thereupon he prepared an Army thitherward, vnder the Conduct of Lord Edward Seimer Earle of Hertford Lieutenant General by Land, accompanied with the Earle of Shrewsbury, and a Fleece of two hundred saile by Sea, whereof Sir Iohn Dudley, Vicount Lisle was Admiral.

(124) To the aide of the Scots the Popes holiness was very forward, who sent them the Patriarch of Venice as his Legate, & Orator, to perswade their Resolutions, with whom the French King sent Monsieur la Broche, and Monsieur Menager, to lead them to fight, and fifty thousand Crownes of the Sun, to sustaine the Charge; with munition worth ten thousand Crownes more. It seemeth by Lefty that part of this siluer fell into the Earle Lennox his hand, and that therewith he made head against the Gouvernour, but not able to match him, sent vnto King Henry for aide, with proffer of his seruice against the French side, which so well was accepted of Henry, as he made him his Nephew, by giuing the Lady Margaret his sisters daughter to be his wife.

(125) The English thus seconded with this vnlooked for Alliance, Cardinall Beaton thought good to binde all to the Gouvernour, who with the Authority of the Queene Dowager proclaimed Lennox an Enemy to the State. But in the meane while the Admirall of England was entred the Frith, and at new Hauen landed his men, where ioining his, to the land Service, they altogether marched thence towards Lieth, himselfe leading the Vaward, Shrewsbury the Rereward, and the Lord Lieutenant the maine Battell. These coming to Lieth, spoiled the Town, and thence to Edenbrough, burnt the City, and wasted the Country for fawen miles about, this done they set fire vpon Haddington, and Dunbarre, and then the whole Army returned vnto Barwicke.

(126) Whilst things thus passed in Scotland, and the maine purpose resting in suspence, King Henry well knew where the greatest rub did lie in his way, which was the French King, the chiefe Abetter of the Scots, whom he euer upheld, to hold him tacked at home, least otherwise he should tug with France for his owne right. And therefore hauing ioined with the Emperour against the French, sent his Herald, Garter, King at Armes, to demand certaine covenants, which if he refused, to proclaim defiance vnto open warres, but he not suffered to doe his message to the King, returned, and Henry prepared an expedition into France, wherein he imploied the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford and Surrey, the Lords, Russell, Grey, Ferrers, Moutjoy, and Saint-Iohn, besides many other seruicable Knights, and Sir Iohn Dudley appointed high Admirall for the Seas. with the Emperials, and shewed their value in the siege of Mattrel.
(127) The Duke of Suffolke in the meane while strucke downe his Standards on the East side of Bol-loigne, and with many sharpe skirmishes, entred the bale Towne, which siege King Henry himselfe in person seconded, who hauing passed the Seas from England, vpon the sixte & twentieth of Iuly, encamped before Bolloigne on the East side, whence his Canons rent the Walls and Bulwarke, as their mounted tops lay vpon the Ground, and his great mortar peeces were discharged with so skillfull a Compasse, that their bullets falling downe right, beate all buildings downe vpon the Enemies heads. Whereby (faith Seidane) in short time he got that, which neither his father, nor the Kings in former times could neuer winne. For thereupon the Town was surrendered and cleared of the French souldiers, women and children.
(128) The King like a Conquerour with his sword borne before him entred the Gate, where the Duke of Suffolke presented him with the keys of the Towne, the Trumpets still sounding, and nothing wanting that might applaud his fame. The Towne thus wonne, the English meant still to keep;
for the strengthening whereof, the King commanded the faire Church of Saint Maries to be taken downe, and in the same place, a mount to be raised for the planting of Ordinance, to annoy any siege.
But being thus busied in Bolloignes affaires, the Em-perour without his knowledge or consent, came to a peace with the French King, whereas King Henrie was fore displeased, and the sooner left France, leauing Sir Iohn Dudley Lord Lisle, his deputy in Bol-loigne, and landed at Douer the first day of October, to his great honor and ioy of his Subiects.
(129) The French King chafed with this late and great losse, sought to trie fortune in further attempts, and that not only for the recovery of Bol-loigne (which with twenty thousand well appointed hee assaied) but also in assaying the English dominions, as the Ile of Wight and those parts of Suffes that lay vpon the Seas, though with losse of many Captaines and thousands of Souldiers, that neuer returned to tell him what entertainment they had;
as likewise in sending aide vnto Scotland, where Monsieur Montgomery of the Order of France, with 5000 strong, entred to maintaine the breach betwixt them and K. Henry, which was so followed on both parts, as the English making a Roade towards Gedwarth, got praise for their valour, but reproch for their spoiles, and the Scots renoune for killing the Lord Eure, Lord warden of the East-Marches, with many other Captaines in defence of their Country.
(130) Hereupon an Army of twelue thousand strong was sent into Scotland, whereof the Earle of Hertford was General: with these he forraged the Borders before him, and burnt many Townes in the Middle-Marches, with Kelsey & Coldingham Abbey, the French not halfe to stay the incursion, lay still,
and let them (vnfought with) depart for England.
(131) But the warres renoued againe into France, the Reingraue with a great power came to vituall a Fort built neere vnto Bolloigne; to impeach which, the Earle of Surrey, then Lieutenant of the Towne made forth, but was discomfited in the enterprize, and Sir Edward Poyning Captaine of a Band slaue, with fiftene other Captaines, besides many Officers and Common Souldiers. These Princes wars in these violent proceedings, became very fear-full least they would grow to the Common hurt of Christendome, and therefore many other potentates, whereof the Emperour was first, solicited these Kings vnto a peace, which the sooner was heard and embraced, for that they were both of them old, and King Henry diseased in body, Commissioners therefore appointed certaine articles were agreed vpon:
the first thereof was, that the French King should pay vnto King Henry, eight hundred thousand Crownes in eight yeeres space, and then to reenter

vpon Bolloigne, but in the meane time it to remaine vnder the English; to accomplish which peace Monsieur Danchals high Admirall of France, was sent into England; and Sir Thomas Chyngis Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, to be the Kings Agent at the Foit, for the Baptisme of the Dolphins new borne daughter.
(132) Notwithstanding these Compliments, the sight of Bolloigne was a great sore in the French mens eyes, inasmuch that Monsieur Chatillon Captain of Montplaisier, begaine to make a new Bastillon neere vnto the Towne, even in the very mouth of the Riuer, which the Lord Grey of Wilton perceiuing certified the King, what inconuenience would happen if that were made strong, and the same disfulled at the Counsell-Table, it passed with one voice that the Peace with France was not to be infringed, notwithstanding this French attempt: to which end a prohibition drawne, whereunto King Henry also set his hand, that no let should be made against Chatillon
in his Fort. Howbeit the King commanded Sir Thomas Palmer (imploied in this busines) to bid the Lord Grey to impeach the new worke, and to flat so much as was raised thereof vnto the Earth. This commission read with the report of Command to the Contrary; the Counsell of State; thought it most meete to follow their instructions in writing, least the words might either be mis-delivered or mil-taken. But the Lord Grey causing the messengers words to be writ, and subscribed with all their hands that were present at the report, suddainly and vn-looked for, came to the Fort, and in foure houres space cast downe, what had bene in raising three moneths before, which when the King heard off, he asked his Counsellors what they thought of this;
that Chatillon-garden was cast downe amongst whom one of them answered, the dea thereof was worthy to loose his head, I had rather (said the King) loose a dozen of such heades as thine is, then his that had done the deed, and immediately sent the Lord Grey his pardon with many great thanks.
(133) But now the date of his time almost run, and he preparing towards the way of all flesh, the great and faire Church of the Gray Friars London, lately suppressed by himselfe, he caused againe to be opened, and to be made a Parish Church, giuing the reuenues thereof vnto the Cite of London towards the reliefe of their poore, whereunto he gaue fue hundred Markes yeerely of Lands for euer to maintaine Gods diuine seruice and the laid Churches reparations, within whose walles we finde this often written, This is Christs Church founded by King Henrie the eight.
(134) And his sicknes increasing to the great danger of life he prepared himselfe to make his Will, wherein howeuer titles had bene vnhabled in Parliaments, he ordained his three children to succede each after others, for want of other Issue; One thousand markes he commanded to be giuen to the poore, and to twelue poore Knights at Winstre each of them twelue pence a day for euer, euery yeere a long Gowne of white cloth, the Garter imbroidered vpon the breast, wherein was placed the Croffe of death.

And in great penitency for his sinnes, died vpon Thursday the twenty eight day of January, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 1546. when hee had reigned thirty seuen yeere, nine moneths, and fūe daies, & had liued fifty fūe yeeres, fūe monthes, & fūe daies, whose body with great solemnity was buried at Windfore vnder a most costly and stately Tombe begunne in Copper and gūilt, but neuer finished, in the inclosures of whose Grates is curiously cast this inscription, HENRICVS OCTAVVS REX ANGLIAE, FRANCIAE, DOMINVS HIBERNIAE, FIDELI DEFENSOR with what cost and state this his Monument was intended, is manifested by a Manuscript taken from the true modell thereof, which I receiued from that industrious Herauld, Master Nicholas Charles Lancaster, and for the great magnificence is worthy here to be inferted.

The manner of the Tombe to be made for the Kings Grace at Windfore.

First, the pauement wherevpon the Tombe shall stand, shall be of Orientall stone: That is to say, of Alabaster, Porfido, Serpentine, and other stones of diuers colours, as in the patterne sheweth.

Item, vpon the same Pauement shall be two great steps vnder all the worke of like Orientall stones.

Item, the Basement of the Pillers shall be of white Marble with Angels holding betwene them Crownes or Garlands gūilt, and white Marble as more plainly sheweth in the Patterne.

Item, about the said Basement and Angels, shall be all the old Testament, that is to say, xliiij. Images in the xliiij. Casements of the same two Pillers of the Prophets, and all the Pillers which shall be xvi. shall be of stones Serpentine, Porfido and Alabaster, and other fine Orientall stones, of such colours as is shewed in the Patterne; and the foote of euery pillar, and also the head shall be of Brasse. And euery Prophet shall haue an Angell sit at his foote, with Scripture of the name of his Prophet, and aboute ouer the head of the same shall be the story of his Prophet: in euery of which Story shall be at least viij. or xi. figures.

Item, aboute all the same Pillers shall be another Basement of white Marble, with a partition being made of such fine Orientall stones as the Pillers be, wherein shall be writen such Scriptare as please you.

Item, aboute the same Basement shall be the Story of the new Testament, that is to wit, with the Images of the Apostles, the Euangelists and the foure Doctours of the Church, and euery Image shall haue sitting at his foote a little child with a Scripture of the name of his Image, and a little Basket full of red and white Roses, which they shall shew to take in their hands, and cast them downe off the Tombe and ouer the Pauement, and the Roses that they shall cast ouer the Tombe shall be enamelled and gūilt, and the roses that they cast ouer the Pauements shall be of fine Orientall stones of white and red.

Item, behind all the same Images of the new Testament round shall be made in brasse and gūilt all the life of Iesus Christ from the nativity to his ascension, and it shall be so clearly and perfectly made, that the Mytery of Christs life to his ascension shall plainly appeare.

Item, aboute the said new Testament and Images thereof, and aboute the said life of Christ, shall be a Quire of xx. Angels standing vpon a Basement of white Marble, with great Candlestickes in their hands hauing lightes in them shewing to honour and reuerence the same Tombe.

Item, all these foresaid figures, stories and ornaments shall be made to garnish and ornate the two Pillers of the Church betwene which the Tombe shall be set.

Item, betwene the said two great Pillers of the Church thus garnished, shall be a Basement of white Marble of the height of the Basement of the Pillers, and therein the Epitaph of the King and Queene, with letters of gold, of such Scriptures as yee desire.

Item, vpon the same Basement shall be made two Tombes of blacke touch, that is to say, on either side one, and vpon the said Tombes of blacke Touch shall be made the Image of the King and Queene on both sides, not as death, but as persons sleeping, because to shew that famous Princes leauing behind them great fame, their names neuer doe die, and shall lie in roiall Apparels after the antique manner.

Item, ouer the right hand, ouer both the sides of the same Tombe shall be an Angell which shall hold the Kings Armes, with a great Candlestick, hauing as it were light on it as a Lampe, and in like manner shall be an other Angell holding the Queenes Armes on the left hand with a like Candlestick.

(135) This magnificent Monarch was of presence Maiestical, and of Personage more then ordinarily tall, faire of Complexion and Corpulent of body, very wise and very well learned, of a sudden and ready speech, in youth very prodigall, and in his age very liberal, pleasant and affable, but not to be dallyed with, bolde in attempting, and euer thirstie of potent glory: an expert Souldier, and fauouring such as were actiue or feruicable, according to the then vsual saying, King Henrie loues a man: and indeed somewhat too wel the delights with women, as by his many wiues heere ensuing, may well appeare,

His Wives.

(136) Katherine the first wife to King Henry was the daughter of Ferdinand the sixt King of Spaine, and widow dowager of Prince Arthur his elder brother, as hath bene said: he was married vnto this King the third of Iune: and first of his Raigne, the yeere of saluation 1509. being solemnly crowned with him vpon the twenty fourth day of the same, and was his wife about twenty yeeres, and then diuorced from him by the sentence of the Archbishop of Canterbury: liued three yeeres after by the name of Katherine Dowager. Shee deceased at Kimbalton in the County of Huntington the eight of January, and yeere of Christ 1535. and lieth interred on the North-side of the quire in the Cathedral Church of Peterborow vnder a hearse of Blacke Saye, hauing a white Crosse in the midst.

(137) Anne, the second wife of King Henry, was the second daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltshire and Ormond. Shee was solemnly at Wind-fore created Marchionesse of Pembroke, the first of September and twenty foure of his Raigne, hauing one thousand pound giuen her by yeere, to maintaine her estate. Shee was married vnto King Henry in his Closet at White-Hall, vpon the twenty fifth day of January, and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1533. being the foure and twentieth of his Raigne, and was Crowned with all due obseruances, at Westminster vpon Whitsunday the first of Iune, where the Crowne of Saint Edward was set vpon her head, the scepter of Gould deliuered into her right hand, and the Ivory rodde with the Doue into her left. Shee was his wife three yeeres, three monethes and twenty fūe daies, when being cut off by the sword the nineteenth of May, her body was buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower, leauing her accursed fame to be censured as affections best pleased the vncharitable minded, and her bed to be posselt of a vertuous Lady.

(138) Jane, the third wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Iohn Seimer Knight, and sister to Lord Edward Seimer, Earle of Hertford, and Duke of Somerset. Shee was married vnto him the twientieth of May, euen the next day after the beheading of Eugene Anne, and the twenty eight of his Raigne. Shee was his wife one yeere, fūe monthes and twenty foure daies, and died in Child-bed the fourteenth of October, to the great griefe of the King, who not onely removed from the place, but kept himselfe priuate, and wore the Garment of mourning euen in the Festiual time of Christmas, her body was solemnly conueied to Windfore the eight of Nouember following, where he was interred in the midst of the Quire of the Church within the Castell.

(139) Anne the fourth wife of King Henry and sister to William Duke of Cleue was married vnto him the sixth of January in the thirty one yeere of his Raigne, the yeere of Grace, 1540. there was his wife sixe moneths, after which time certaine Lords of the vpper House of Parliament came into the netheer, and alleged cause for which that marriage was vnlawfull, whereupon shee was diuorced, and by Statute enacted, that shee should no more be taken for Queene, but should be called the Lady Anne of Cleue. See remained in England long after the Kings death, though small mention is made of her by any of our Writers, only we finde that she accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London at the solemnizing of Queene Marias Coronation.

(140) Katherine the fifth wife of King Henry the eight, was the daughter of Edmund, and Neece vnto Thomas Howard his brother, Duke of Norfolk: Shee was married vnto him the eight of August and yeere of Grace 1540. being the thirtieth two of his Raigne, at Hampton Court, and continued his Queene the space of one yeere, sixe moneths and foure daies, and for her vnchaste life was attained by Parliament, and for the same beheaded within the Tower of London the twelfth of February and her body buried in the Chauncell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen.

(141) Katherine the sixth and last wife of King Henry was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall and sister to Lord William Parre Marquess of Northampton, shee was first married to Iohn Neuill, Lord Lauder, and after his decease, vpon the twelfth of Iuly married vnto the King at Hampton Court, the yeere of Saluation, 1543. and thirtieth five of his Raigne: Shee was his wife three yeeres, sixe months and fūe daies, and suruiuing him, was againe married vnto Thomas Seimer Lord Admirall of England, vnto whom she bare a daughter, but died in the same Child-bed, the yeere of Grace, 1548.

His Issue.

(142) Henrie the first sonne of King Henry by Queene Katherine his first wife, was borne at Richmond in Surrey vpon the first of January, and the first of his fathers Raigne, whose Godfathers at Font were the Lord Crammer, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Surrey: his Godmother, Lady Katherine Countesse of Devonshire, daughter to King Edward the fourth. This Prince lived not fully two months but died in the same place wherein he was borne, vpon the two and twentieth of February, and his body with all due obsequies buried in Westminster.

(143) A Sonne not named was borne vnto King Henrie by Lady Katherine his first Queene in the month of Nouember, and the sixth yeere of his Raigne, who lived not long, and therefore no further mention of him can be made: the deathes of these Princes King Henrie tooke as a punishment from God, for so he alleged it in the public Court held in Blacke-friers London, they being begot on his owne brothers wife.

(144) Marie the third childe and first daughter of King Henrie by Queene Katherine his first wife, was borne at Greenwich in Kent, the eighteenth of February in the yeere of Christs humanity, 1518 and the eighth of his Raigne. Shee was by the direction of her mother brought vp in her Childe-hood by the Countesse of Salisbury her neere kinswoman, for that as some thought, the Queene wished a marriage betwixt some of her sons and the Princesses, to strengthen her Title by that Alliance into Torke, if the King should die without issue Male. In her young yeeres shee was fued to be married with the Emperour, the King of Scots, and the Duke of Orleans in France, but all these failing, and shee succeeding her brother K Edward in the Crowne, at the age of thirte fixe yeeres, matched with Philip King of Spain, to the great dislike of many, and small content to her selfe, hee being imploied for the most part beyond the Seas, for griefe whereof and the losse of Calce, shee lastly fell into a burning feauer, that cost her her life.

(145) Elizabeth the second daughter of King Henrie, and first childe by Queene Anne his second wife, was borne at Greenwich, vpon Sunday the seuenth of September, the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1534 and twenty five of her Fathers Raigne, who with due solemnities was baptized the Wednesday following, Archbishop Crammer, the old Dutches of Norfolke, and the old Marchionesse of Dorset being the witnesses at the Font, and the Marchionesse of Excester at the confirmation: Shee succeeded her sister Queene Marie in the Monarchy of England, and was for wisdom, vertue, piety, and Iustice, not one-lie the Mirroure of her Sexe, but a patterne for Government to al the princes in Christendome: whose name I may not mention without a dutiful remembrance, and whose memory vnto me is most deare, amongst the many thousands that receiued extraordinary fauours at her gracious and most liberrall hand.

(146) Another man-childe Queene Anne bare vnto King Henrie, though without life vpon the nine and twentieth of January, and twenty seuen of his Raigne, to the no little griefe of the mother, some dislike of the King, as the sequel of her accusation and death did shortly confirme.

(147) Edward the last childe of King Henrie, and first of Queene Iane his third wife, was borne at Hampton Court, the twelfth of October, the yeere of Grace, 1537, and twenty nine of the Kings Raigne, being cut out of his mothers wombe as is constantly affirmed, like as Julius Cæsar is said to haue been: his Godfathers at the Font, was Thomas Crammer, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolk, his sister Lady Mary being Godmother, faith Grafton: Sixe daies after his birth he was created Prince of Wales, and at the death of his Father, succeeded him in all his Dominions, of whom more followeth hereafter.

His Natwall Issue.

(148) Henrie Fitz-Rois the naturall sonne of King Henrie the eight was begotten of the Lady Talboise called Elizabeth Blunt, and borne in the Mannor of Blackmore in Essex about the tenth yeere of his Raigne; at the age of sixe yeeres he was created Earle of Nottingham and in the five and twentieth of his Fathers Raigne vpon the eighteenth of Iune in the Kings Pallace of Bridewell was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Lord Warden of the East, West, and Middle-Marches against Scotland, and Lieutenant General of all the parts of England Northward, he was a Prince very forward in Marhal Activities, of Good literature and knowledge in the tongues, vnto whom the learned Antiquary Leland dedicated a Booke; He married Marie daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall and Lord high Treasurer of England, with whom he liued not long, but died at Saint Iames by Westminster the two and twentieth of Iuly in the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1536, and was buried at Framingham in Suffolke.

THe tempestuous stormes in the Raigne of this King Henrie the eight, and the violent deluge raised against the Church-state of his times; bare downe so many religious strong foundations, and were the destruction of so many beautifull Monasteries, as the onely relation of their numbers and names, would haue much interrupted the narration of his history. Wherefore to reiteine their memorials (though their wallies are laid waste) aswell for the reuerence we owe vnto venerable Antiquity, as for the example of their Founders holy zeale, we haue inserted a Catalogue of their names, orders, and true valuations, as in the originall Booke thereof taken by Commission, and giuen vnto the King, we finde them downe, though at their dissolutions their values were fauourably and farre vnder rated. Some Founders, and times of foundations wee want, the rest, Tablwise, to auoid prolixity wee haue set downe in this present following

CHAPTER.

A CATALOGVE OF THE RELIGIOUS HOUSES VVITHIN THE REALME OF ENGLAND AND VVales, with many their Orders, Founders, and Values, most of them being suppressed by King Henrie the eight. Together with such other sacred places, as either then were by him left standing, or since haue been erected.

CHAPTER XXII.

AD. 1547.

Griston.

Edward created Duke of Wales
on his birth.

EDVVARD the sixt of that Name, and onely sonne liuing vnto King Henry the eight, was borne at his Mannor of Hampton Court in Middlesex, the twelfth of October, and yeere of saluation, 1537. and fixe dayes after being the eighteenth of the same moneth, hee was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester: his birth was ioyfull vnto the King and Commons; but the death of his mother, the vertuous Queen Iane, brought immediat sorow vnto both, whose womb was cut (as some haue affirmed) to the sauing of his, but losse of her owne life, vpon whose death these elegant verses were writ;

Phenix Iana sacet nato Phœnice, dolendum Sæcula Phœnices nulla tulisse duas.

*Here lies the Phenix Lady Iane, whose death a Phœnix bare,
O grieve, two Phœnixes at one time, together neuer were.*

(2) Nine yeeres and od monethes hee was veruouly trained vp in the life of his father, and at his death appointed the first of his heires, and for want of Issue (if it so chanced) Mary, and thence failing, Elizabeth to succeed in his throne. for as Henry with Salomon was blame-worthy for women, so left hee but one sonne and two daughters, as the other in Scripture is said to haue done: Salomon had Rehoboam a foole and vnfortunate, his daughters, but obscure, and both of them Subiects; but Henry was

was more happy in Edward his sonne, who proued another young Salomon himselfe, and his sisters both Soueraignes of an Imperiall Crowne.

(3) He beganne his raigne the twenty eight of January, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 1546, and the last of that moneth was proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; and supreme Gouvernour of these Churches, with other his rightfull Titles to his Imperiall Stiles belonging. And on the twentieth of February following being Shroue-Sunday, was Crowned at Westminster with all due Solemnities.

(4) His Counsellors were appointed by his sickle Father as we haue said, and Protector ouer his Minoritie and Realmes (by consent of the Nobles) was ordained his Vncle Edward Lord Seymer Earle of Herford and Duke of Somerset, brother vnto Queene Jane, who thereupon gaue the young King the Order of Knight-hood, and the King immediately did the like vnto the Lord Maier of London.

(5) His first busines was to establish Gods seruice, who had established him in the Throne, and as another Iofiah in godly zeale, destroyed Idolatry, by pulling downe Images in England, as that King in Iudah did the Altars of Baalim, fought the Saluation of his Subiects, by sending forth Preachers to instruct the people, as Iofiah did the Lewites the teachers of Israel vnto their charges: brought the Bible in a knowne language to be read in the Church, as he did the Arke into the Temple of the Lord, commanded the ancient and true vse of the Sacrament in both kindes, as Iofiah commanded the Passouer both to be kild and celebrated in Jerusalem, and in all things proued another Iofiah indeed.

(6) And as Edward was busied in setting forth Gods glorie, so the Protector and Council were careful for the State of the Realme, and especially for their Kings marriage with Mary the young Queen of Scotland, vnto which a Parliament at Edenburgh had consented in Anno 1543, and for confirmation thereof had sent into England, William Earle of Glamorgan, Sir George Dowglas, Sir William Hamilton, and Sir James Leirmond, Scotch Knights, Ambassadors, vnto King Henry deceased, betwixt whom the contracts were sealed interchangeably as we haue said.

(7) And now by the Council of England was thought most fit to be fought after, and consummated, for the wealth and peace of the whole Iland: wherefore they published their desires to that end, in an Epistle sent to the Scottish Nobilitie, directed vnto them by the Lord Protector, wherein they were remembered of the many incursions, roades, and spoiles, committed and done, vpon either Kingdome through their continual hostilities, and warres: shewing likewise the necernesse of language, lineaments, and conditions of the Nations; inhabiting the same Iland, and therefore a most sure token (as they tooke it) to be defended from one and the same Originals vrging Gods prouidence, that had taken away all the Male-Princes of Scotland, leaving them only one daughter and in England, onely one sonne vnto King Henry among his many wiues. Their Princes themselves for yeeres, qualities, and magnificence, fely ordained to contract the vnion of Peace: alleging that England fought neither the prehemine nor the conquest of Scotland, but rather desired an equality both in state and government; and to that end offered to take the name of Britaine indifferent to both, though dishonorable to themselves, in bereauing their Nation of the glorie achieved, in many of their victories. These notwithstanding, the Scottish persisted to bestow their young Queene another way.

(8) Whereupon the Protector in person, vnder-tooke an expedition into Scotland, accompanied with the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Dares, and Grey of Wilton, many Knights, and a most warlike army of Souldiers. Edward Lord Clinton Admirall of the Fleet was appointed to Sea, and Sir William Woodhouse made his Vice-admirall: these meeting at Berwicke set forth into Scotland, declaring by found of Trumpet the cause of their coming, with profers of peace to all such of that Nation, as would aduance the marriage betwixt their two Princes, according to Couenants already concluded vpon.

(9) The Gouvernour of Scotland hearing newes of many Cattles surrender and surprize, and feares daily increasing by augmented reports, commanded his Herauldes with all possible diligence, to passe through all the parts of the Realme, and the fire Crosse to be borne wherefoeuer they came, a Custome indeed anciently vsed in greatest extremity, and onely then after this manner, two fire Brands set a Crosse were carried vpon the point of a speare, with Proclamation of the eminent danger, calling for aide, assigning the time and place, when and whither they were to resort: yet there be that say, It was a painted red Crosse set vp for certaine daies in the Field of that Barony, whereunto the aide should come: and those that refused, being aboute sixteene, and vnder sixty were accounted traitours, and their Land confiscated to the King. This ancient muster the Gouvernour commanded, appointing them a day to be at Muskillburn in defence of their liberties and young Princes life: which presently strucke such regard to their hearts, that thither they throng who should bee first, and pitched their Standards euen in the face of the Enemy.

(10) Many warlike enterprises were attempted betwixt them, many prisoners taken, and stout Souldiers slaine, vpon the Scots part the Lord Hume by a fall from his horse lost his life, & his sonne with one Maxwell and sixe other Gentlemen taken prisoners. Of the English were hurt Henry Vane, and Barteneill, a French-man: Bulmer, Gower, and Crouch, three Captaines of the light horsemen were taken prisoners: all which so happened before the day of great Battell.

(11) Whilist these things proceeded, and either part plaied vpon the advantage, Earle Huntly of Scotland sent a Herauld and Trumpet vnto England Protector, with profers of Combate, either twenty to twenty, ten to ten, or in single fight themselues man to man, which surely was honorable, the Scots hauing aduantage for pumber, and Charitable for the sauing of Christian blood: but their persons vnequall in regard of his place, that demand was denied, and profers made for the battell, which happened euen the next day following, being the tenth of September and the last of the weeke.

(12) The place where the English lay encamped, was vpon the Bankes of Edenbrough Frith, wherein their Ships stoted to further the Land seruice, and those seeking the aduantage of a hill called Pinkincleche, halted thitherward betimes in the morning; the Scottish thinking they had fled to their Shippes, made the like halt to impeach their March, their Armie they diuided into three Battels, the Vanguard whereof was led by the Earle of Angus, the rereguard by the valiant Earle Huntley, and in the great Battell, was the Gouvernour with the Earle of Argile, and many other of the Scottish Nobilitie.

(13) These eager of spoile, and filled with hope, halted furiously forward, without all feare or any good Order, and breath-leffe, almost passed ouer the Riuer Eske, preventing thereby the expectation of the enemy, but being within danger of shot, the English Fleet from the Roade let freely fly among a wing of the Irish Archers, slaying many, with such terror to the rest, as hardly could they be gotten for to goe forward, which indangered them more. The Scottish Armie thereupon remoued somewhat Southward, seeking to get the higher ground with aduantage both of Sunne and winde, the desire whereof caused them little to regard the helpe of horse, but for haste drew their great Ordinance thitherward only by maine strength of men.

(14) The English Captaines perceiving what the Scottish intended, and that now no skirmish but a Battell must be vndergone fell to Consultation, being mounted in their saddles, where with such resolutions they departed asunder, that John Earle of Warwicke, Lord Marshall of the field, desired the Protector to be good vnto his wife and Children, if on his part things went not well with him. By this time the Armies were at point to ioine battell, in the place called Edmondstone-edge neere vnto Muskillburn, where the Master of the English Ordinance had mounted two Canons neere vnto the top of the hill. The Scottish came forward, faster then an ordinary Marche, their pikemen thicke ranged together, bearing broad Bucklers in their left hands.

(15) At the first encounter Captain Shelley Lieutenant of the band of Bulleners: Captain Ratcliffe brother to the Lord Fixwater, with many Gentlemen of name and account, were slaine, and the Lord Grey of Wilton General of the Horsemen, dangerously hurt in the mouth with a Pike: and indeed such was the fury of the Scots first encounter, that the English horsemen were forced backe, and in retiring ranne through, and bare downe a part of their owne foote-men, to their great hurt: when their Kings Standard (borne by Sir Andrew Flammoche) was laid flat hold on by the Scottish, and had not that Knight strength beene the more, and his horse the better, himselfe had beene slaine, and the Standard lost, which notwithstanding was graiped so fast, that the Scots bare away the Nether end of the staffe to the burrell.

(16) The Canons from the hill, plaied fore vpon the Scottish, and so did the Ordinance out of the English Fleet, whose terrible noise and smooke, filled the Armies with furious Cries, and darkened the day as with the Clouds of night: The retreat of the Protectors Horsemen, disordering their fellows (as is said) gaue signes vnto the Scots of a present victory, who now vpon a forward Courage distanked themselues for halt, and fell vpon the disbanded English, who presently by their leaders were brought into Array, and fiercely pressed forward vpon the vangard of the enemy, their aduantage the more, for that the Scots wanted shot to answere their violence; which caused them in hast confusedly to retire towards their great Battell, and those misdeeming the day had beene lost, turned their backs and fled; the chase was followed almost fife miles, wherein the Lord Fleming with sundry men of note were slaine: Bishop Leslie recorder ninth by name, besides ten thousand of their souldiers that therein lost their liues, and prisoners taken, about a thousand persons, the chiefe whereof was the Earle of Huntly, Chancellour of Scotland, the Lord Resler, Hobby, Hamilton Captaine of Dunbarre, the Master of Sampole, the Lord Wimmes and a brother of the Earle of Caithes: such was the successe of the English, and losse of the Scottish.

(17) Lieth they sacked and set on fire, tooke the Iland Saint Colmes, brought their Rockesburgh, Humes Castle, and others: so that many Gentlemen in Tiuidall, and the Meres, came to the Protector and entered into termes and conditions of Peace. In the meane while by the working of the Gouvernour, and Queene Dowager, the young Queene was suddenly conveyed from Striueling, vnto the Ile, and Abbay of Michmahemo, as to a place of more security, and shortly after into France to be married vnto the Dolphine, thence then being of age betwixt fife and sixe: whereat the English so stormed, as they determined and threatened the Conquest of Scotland. But God who is the disposer of Kingdomes, and hath the hearts of Princes in his owne hand, in his vnsearchable decrees, saw it not time to vntie as yet, the whole Iland vnder one Crowne, to which end he suffered the French to assist the Scots, and England to be burthened with her owne ciuill broyles.

(18) For the Protector returned, and a Parliament at London assembled, all Colledged Free-Chapels, and Chanteries, were given to the King, where in was repealed the Statute formerly made, and commonly called the fixe articles, which had beene the cause of many Martyrs deaths, in the daies of King Henry his Father, as also other enacted by King Richard the second, and Henry the first, for the suppression of Scriptures in English, and other points held, in their daies accounted heretical, at which time also iniunctions went forth to cleanse the Church of all Images, and Commissioners sent with authority to pull them downe, who first began at the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul in London, and thence proceeded casting downe those Idols, in all the Churches throughout England and Wales. Whereof great stirres presently happened and in Cornwall the first.

(19) For the Kings Commission being put in practice, and these gay golden Images cast downe, broken and burnt, their Priests accounted the Act sacrilegious, and one of them as Baals for zeale, fought to make his sacrifice with blood, but sparing his owne, sheathed his knife in the heart of Master Bodys a Commissioner, imploied about the same business: which fact was so fauoured among the rural Commons of Cornwall, and Devonshire (who euer gaue voice for the papall continuance) that in a rebellious manner they combined together against the King.

(20) Their chiefe Captaines were Humfrey Arundell, Gouvernour of the Mount, with sixe other Gentlemen of name, neither were the Priests backward in so bad a worke, whereof Robert Bocham, and seauen others were the forwardest men; accompanied with no lesse then ten thousand tall Souldiers, who all fought to vndoe those points of religion, which the King by law and act of Parliament had ordained to be obserued: Whereupon they besieged the City of Excester, and with many sharp assaults fought the possession thereof, twice firing the Gates, and leaving nothing vndone that either wit or warre would afford to obaine: for they brought the Citizens to such distresse that they forced them to mould vp branne for their bread, working it in Cloathes, for otherwife could they not bring it to incorporate together: their daintiest flesh was their owne horses, and those slaine were distributed aswell to the poore as rich for which their loyalty and most faithfull seruice King Edward did both highly esteeme them, and richly reward them by confirmation of the Cities Charters, enlarging the liberties, augmenting the reuenues and giuing vnto the Citizens the manner of Exilemd, as the signet of his loue for their seruice to the Crowne, to be had in remembrance of their loyalty for euer. Meane while the Rebels robbed the Countrey, vnto whom all things was common that came vnto hand.

(21) The Rebels, thus pestering those parts with their riotous attempts, looked and well hoped that others would haue ioined to their aide, but therein deceived, they lastly fell to Consultation what was to be done, and in fine concluded for the best policy to atticle with the King, which how to be set downe, bred likewise much trouble and disturbance with their confused cries: for these rude and vnexperienced Counsellors made their owne conceiued opinions the fundamentall matters for redresse, some would haue this, and other some that; but none would be gainesaid of his will or demand, holding his voice as worthy of hearing in this Court of assembly, as his body an aide to support the Action, so that long it was ere they could fight on their owne discontentes; and longer ere they could agree what they would haue reformed, onely still constant in variable vnconstancy, for some would haue no Iustices, others no Gentlemen, Parkes must be Parkes, and Infollores must downe, the Priests euer pulling the Bell rope to ring the Mass into England, and to towle Cardinalles Peale from Rome, and with much much adoe, lastly to little purpose these Articles were agreed vpon, and sent to the King, the Copy whereof was thus.

(22) Forasmuch as man, except he be borne of Water and the holy Ghost, cannot enter into the kingdom of God, and forasmuch as the gates of Heaven be not open without this blessed Sacrament of Baptisme, therefore we will that our Curates shall minister this Sacrament, at all times of need as well in the weeke daies, as on the holy daies.

Item, wee will haue our children confirmed of the Bishops whensoever we shall within the Diocesse resort vnto them.

Item forasmuch as we constantly beleue that after the Priest hath spoken the words of Consecration being at Masse, there celebrating and consecrating the same, there is very really the Body and blood of our Sauour Iesus Christ God and Man, and that no substance of Bread and Wine remaineth after, but the very same Body that was borne of the Virgine Mary, and was giuen vpon the Crosse for our Redemption: therefore we will haue Masse celebrated as it hath bene in times past, without any man communicating with the Priests, forasmuch as many rudely presuming vnworthily to receive the same put no difference betwene the Lords body and other kind of meate; some saying that it is bread before and after: some saying that it is profitable to no man except hee receiue it, with many other abused termes.

Item we will haue in our Churches referuation.
Item wee will haue holy bread, and holy water in the remembrance of Christs precious Body and blood.

Item we will that our Priests shall sing and say with an audible voice, Gods seruice in the Quiet of the Parish Churches, and not Gods seruice to be set forth like a Christmas play.

Item for asmuch as Priests be men dedicated to God, for ministering and celebrating the blessed Sacrament, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they shall liue chaste without marriage, as Saint Paul did, being the elect and chosen vessel of God: saying vnto all honest Priests, beyee followers of mee.

Item we will that the fixe Articles which our Soueraigne Lord King Henry the eight set forth in his later daies, shall bee vsed, and so taken as they were at that time.

Item we pray God saue King Edward, for we be his both body and goods.

(23) To these their Demands the King sent this answer, therein pitying their ignorance, and blaming their folly, and therewithall his Generall pardon, to as many as would desist whiles it was time. First he reproved them, for their presumptions, thus contumeliously to rise against their dread Soueraigne, to the disturbance of his loyal Subjects peaces; whose simplicity they had notoriously abused, in viling his name to draw them into action of Rebellion: and no lesse likewise in the grounds of their demands. As in their first Article for Baptisme, where it was well knowne the same was admitted as necessity required, or rather commanded by the Booke of Common praier, published by authority of Parliament, and as themselves knew in present practise. But touching the Sacrament in their second Article, how impudently they did belie the true receivers thereof, was manifest, who make so much difference in that holy administration, that they account no profit in Common bread, besides the nourishment of their naturall Bodies: but this blessed bread to be the food of their soules vnto eternall life. And as you are seduced in these (saith the admonition) so in confirmation also they carry your simplicities captiue, for the truth teacheth no otherwise then themselves beleue, namely, that a Child baptized, and giue before confirmation is neither in state of Grace, else are themselves causes of their childrens damnation: so the seruice of God brought from an vnknowne tongue, cannot surely offend any reasonable man, which is onely to make him vnderstand that, which before he knew not, and to giue his consent to those prayers, whereof he hath most need, and giueeth the neere touch to his owne feeling conscience for God requieth the heart onely which with an vnderstanding seruice, we must sacrifice vnto him. But most of all (saith this good King) we maruell at your demand, for the fixe Articles restored, to haue them in power as formerly hath bene. Doe you know what you aske, or in obtaining doe you know what you get? They were lawes indeed lately made, but quickly repented; too cruell for you, and too mercilesse for vs; who would haue our Raigne written with milke, and not with blood, and because they were bloody, we took them away, with the same authority, by which they were made; least reteining them, our sword should be too often drawne, and rigour extended vpon our true and well-deseruing Subjects. We for our parts seeke no longer to liue, then to be a father vnto our people, and as God hath made vs your rightful King, so hath he commanded you vnto obedience: by whose great Maiestie we sweare, you shall feelee the power of the same God in our sword, which how mighty it is, no Subject knoweth, how puissant it is no private man can iudge, and how mortall no English heart can thinke: therefore embrace our mercy while it is offered, least the blood spilt by your meanes cry vengeance from the Earth, and be heard in the eares of the Lord in Heaven.

(24) All this notwithstanding, the Rebels persisted in their traitorous attempts: against whose seditions Sir John Russell Lord Priuy Seale, was appointed Generall of the Kings Army; vnto whose assistance was ioined the Lord Grey of Wilton, vnder whom serued a band of Italians intended against Scotland, theie lay at Brisflow attending the coming of the Lord Generall: who now was marched Westward to Hamton, where daily looking for more supply, those which he had, began to shrink away, whereby the Rebels were emboldned to make towards him, and came as far as Fenington-bridge within three Miles of Hamton, and in a faire Meadow there spread their Colours. The Lord Russell though weak in comparison of them, holding it more honour to assaile then to be assailed, made forward euen vnto the Bridge: at whose sight the Enemies prepared themselves to fight, and with a strong guard maintained the Bridge, besides which there was passage ouer the Riuer, that held his course betwixt the two Armies.

(25) Great were the attempts the Lord Lieutenant gaue, and manfull was the resistance that the Rebels made, yet lastly the way was wonne, and followed vnto the battell of the disloyals: where presently began a most cruell fight, and a while was maintained to the losse of their blood, but the false hearts failing, and the true Subjects courage increasing, the Cornish immediately gaue backe and fled, whereat the Kings soldiers out of Order fell to the spoile, minding nothing lesse then that which presently ensued, for the Cornishmen perceiuing their disordered carriage, suddenly returned, and began a new fight, when the Lord Russell likewise ordered a new his Army: these furiously ioining, a sharpe and cruell encounter ensued, with the losse of much blood, and the lues of three hundred Rebels, who lastly tooke to their heeles and left the field: the chase a while followed, and the soldiers scattered, a fearful cry suddenly arose, that all the Commons were vp, which caused the Lord Generall to returne vnto Hamton: whether shortly came the Lord Grey of Wilton, hauing in pay Spanish an Italian Captaine with three hundred foot.

(26) The Lord Russell forces augmented, his greatest care was to releue the City Exeter, whither vpon the third of August he halted from Hamton being a thousand strong; and passing ouer the Downes toward Woodbury, lodged his Campe that night neere to the Wind-Mill, whereof the Rebels hauing intelligence, raised themselves from Saint Mary Clift, and made amaine vnto the Downes, thinking to surpriue the Lord Generall before hee was ready; but hee as vigilant as they were forward, encountered them againe in battell, and againe gaue them the ouerthrow with the losse of the most of their liues, the rest escaping by flight, got vnto the Towne of Saint Mary Clift.

(27) The newes thereof bruited, and the Papal side bruited by these three ouerthrowes, the Commons in whole troupes resorted to their aide, and to make all sure on their side (by the presence and helpe of their consecrated God) they brought into the field the Crucifix vnder a Canopy, which in stead of an Altar was set in a carte, accompanied with Crosse, and Candlesticks, Banners, Holy Bread, and holy-water, both to driue away Diuels, and to dull their enemies swords; which notwithstanding they did not, neither could they deliuer themselves in the day of destruction; for the Towne being fired, and the Armies met vpon Clift heath, a most cruell and bloody battell was fought, wherein was slaine the whole rout of the Rebels, & all these trinkets cast in the dirt.

(28) The chiefe Captaines were taken and sent vnto London, who were Humfrey Arundell, Winsland, Holmes and Burie, who there paid the law with the losse of their liues. Many others were executed without iudgement, onely by Marshall Law, as was Boier Maior of Bodmin in Cornwall, vnto whom Sir Anthony Kingston, Prouost Marshall sent worde he would visite him at dinner, but before he was set downe, commanded the Maior to cause a paire of Gallows to be set vp; & the Table taken away, he willed the said Maior to accompany him to the place, & there presently commanded Boier his Host to the halter, and saw him hanged before he departed.

(29) At the same time, and neere the same place dwelled a Miller, who had bene a busie doer in the Rebellion, but hee knowing the danger, willed his man to take the name of the master, if any enquired after him; whereupon the said Sir Anthony came to the mill, and calling for the master, the man in his name presented himselfe, who trait commanded him vnto the Gallows, the seruant then seeing the danger of death, confessed hee was not the master, but the man: well, said the Knight, thou canst neuer doe thy master better seruice then to hang for him, and thereupon trusted him vnto the next tree.

(30) As these things were in acting in the West, so other Commotions arose in other partes of the Land, though broched vnder another pretence, namely the laying open of inclosures, which the king by Proclamation had commanded to be done, but many offenders bearing themselves out with greatnesse, slackened the execution, and the poorer presuming vpon the Kings pleasure, began to execute his commission themselves, and chose in many places at once, as in Kent, Essex, Sommerfet, Buckingham, Northampton and Lincoln shires they did.

(31) But most dangerous was that in Norfolk, whole Inhabitants following the examples of the rest, held out much longer, and in more violent manner. Their first attempt was at Aylborough against one Greene that had taken away part of their commons, next at Wymonham, where by the instigation of John Flowerdew they cast downe the fences of Inclosures, belonging to Robert Keta a Tanner in the same Towne; who to bee euen with Flowerdew brought them to Hetherfet, and set them on worke to pull downe both hedge and ditch of his pasture grounds inclosed: to which worke hee gaue such desperate encouragements, that these vnriues presently chose him for their ringleader, who with them passed to Benthrope, laying all leuel where they came.

(32) Their number encreasing, and doings outrageous, Sir Edmund Windam Knight, at that time high Sherriffe of the Shire, made proclamation among them in the Kings name to depart, which if they did not forthwith, he pronounced them Traitors, but had not his Horse bene the swifter, hee had bene either taken or slaine, thereupon their terror began to be fearfull, & themselves to be furnished with weapons, Armour, and Artillery, daily brought them in abundance by the By-dwellers, besides store of victuals to maintain their Campe.

(33) But now considering what dangers were open, if disperdely scattered they should attend their bad worke, they held it best policy to draw to one place: and to fortifie themselves together with further strength; whereupon with full resolution, Monbold was thought fittest neere vnto Mount Surrey, a place built by these Earles of that County, and vpon S. Leonards hill which hangeth ouer Norwich, they vnknelted themselves, besides these of Monbold, a lesser rabble of them lay at Rising-chase neere Linne, which were rowled thence by the Gentlemen of those parts: who first from Watton, then from Thesford, and next from Bradon, were forced to their litter at Monbold.

(34) Their parts were rigorous, or rather inhumane euen to their welwillers, for it is knowne truth, that Sir Roger Woodhouse in kinde courtesie bringing them two Carts laden with Beere, and another with victuals, was recompensed with the losse of all his Horses, his owne apparell, and his body tugged, and torne, cast into a ditch, whom lastly with others was imprisoned by them in the house of Mount Surrey, and yet would they seeme verie Religious, hauing one Comiers for their Chaplen, who devoutly said seruice vnto them both morning and evening.

(35) To these, the lewdly disposed of Suffolke assembled, as also the scum and dregs out of Northwich, adding still fewell to their own smoaky flames by firing of Beacons, ringing of Bels, and what not, to set all in an uproare: some true and faithfull Subjects they violently led away, and made them of their counsell, namely Thomas God, Maior of Norwich, Robert Watton Preacher, and Thomas Alderliche Gentleman, Sergeant & Cailyn, Sergeant Gandy, whom they kept fettered, and compelled them to be attendant vpon Kette; who now tooke vpon him to bee the Kings Deputy, and to giue out warrants in his Maiesties name, by vertue of which many of Worship and credit were fetched from their dwellings, brought before him, and violently cast into prison: their Rabble encreased to the number of sixteene thousand men.

(36) And that the shew of iustice and piety was only the marke whereat these lawlesse leuelled, they ordained a tribunall feat in an olde tree, whose Canopie was the Cope of Heaven: In this late the Tanner as Chauncellor or chiefe Iudge, accompanied with his Counsellors, assisted by two chosen men out of euery hundred among them, higher assembled the complaints of the Campe, and hence had they commission to fetch out of Ships both Ordinance, powder and shotte, and out of Gentlemens houses all abilements of ware: and heere such Raskals as had exceeded their commission had iudgement of imprisonment, so that this tree was termed, the Oake of Reformation, whence likewise sometimes Sermons were deliuered to the people, and once by the Reuerent Doctor Parker, which had almost cost him his life.

(37) To these the Kings generall Pardon was publicly pronounced by an Herald at Arms, but so farre off from embracing, as the Rebels from the height of the hill, shot at the Citie, which doing little harme, they remoued their Ordinance to the lower ground, and thence beganne to batter the walles, and without great resistance entred the town, where they became Masters of all the munitions, and emprisoned the Maior, and many other Citizens.

fought to quiet, and to that end sent the L. William Parr, Marques of Northampton, with fifteen hundred horsemen vnto Norwich, accompanied with the Lords Sheffield, and Wentworth, besides many Knights; who at his first coming thither, summoned the City to yeeld; the Magistrates whereof as willingly obeyed, and repairing to his Standard, yeelded vp their Cities sword vnto him; declaring themselves true Subjects to the King, though some of the bader sort had fauoured Kets doing, and with them immediately the Lord Marquesse entered the City, which the same night was assaulted by the Rebels, whom hee manfully resisted, and slew three hundred of their riotous rout.

(39) The next day following these bloud-hounds vnkennelled by troupes, and entering the City by the Hospitall, begonne a most cruell fight, wherein the Lord Sheffield by the fall of his horse into a ditch was butchered slaime by a Butcher, as he sought to recover himselfe, and the rebels now flected with their fortunate chance, followed the chafe with such slaughter and cry, that they forced the Lord Marquesse to forsake the City, and therein tooke Sir Thomas Cornwallis prisoner, whom they straitly kept in durance till their last overthrow. Norwich they ranlack and set on fire, whose ashes as yet fill vpe their ruines, and more had been made, had not God quenched these flames by shoures from Heauen.

(40) The Lord Marquesse returned, and the Rebels holding Norwich, it was more then time to looke to the maine chance; and therefore those forces that were gathered to invade others, were now thought the fittest to secure our selues, our whom was appointed the Lord John Dudley, the warlike Earle of Warwicke: hee coming to Cambridge prepared for the enemy, whither hee returned the forsake Lord Marquesse, the Lords Willoughby, Powes, and Gray, his sonnes Ambrose and Robert, with many of the Norfolk men, and the twenty three of August shewed himselfe vpon the plaine before Norwich, whence to faue the effusion of bloud, hee sent Norrey and a Trumpet to summon the City, and to offer a general pardon; which being againe refused, hee caused his Ordinance to bee planted against S. Steuens gate, and his Pioners to breake open the brazen gate, whereat many made entry, and diuers were slaime.

(41) S. Steuens gate forced open by Canon shot, the Earle of Warwicke entered the City, and with small resistance came into the Market place, where threecore Rebels were incontinently executed by Marshall law. But the Earles carriages passing thorough the City, were surprized and taken by the enemy, wherein was great store of powder and shot, which with triumph they conuained to their Campe, and tooke it a signe of further successe, their want consulting most in those prouisions, wherupon they manned the streets of that City, and slew very many of the Kings friends; but the shouers of arrowes and shot from the kings Subjects so rained amongst them, that they were forced backe to take shelter in Manshold their hole of refuge.

(42) The Earle of Warwicke thus mastering the City, shuttall the Gates, them onely excepted that gaue way toward Manshold, and those hee planted with his great Artillery. The Rebels perceiving what hee went about, suddainly made downe towards the Gate, and with great courage and confused cries, fell with such violence vpon their attendants, that they gaue backe and fled, leauing their Ordinance to the will of the Rebels, who presently disposed them amongst their owne, so that the Earle stopped likewise those passages, and imploied all his endeauour to defend the City, which notwithstanding he could not, the Rebels making incursions ouer the ruer from their well stored Campe: and setting the firectes in many places on fire, whose attempts so continued and prospered to euill, as some despairing of any good, counselled the Earle to be gone. But so farre was he from such staine of honour, that drawing forth his owne sword, commanded other to doe the like, and with an interchangeable kisse confirmed the resolution of his bold courage, a Custome indeed vied in greatest danger of warre. And thereupon determining another way to worke, sought to stop the passage from all conuoy of victuall, which the Rebels perceiving, set fire on their Cabbins, and with enignes displayed, entrenched themselves at the foote of the Hill, in the valley called Duffin-dale, partly vpon vaine Prophecies pronounced amongst them by certaine wizards, who gaue forth that Hob, Dic, and Hic, (meaning the Rusticks) with their Clubs should fill vp the valley of Duffin-dale with the bodies of the dead.

(43) The next day being the fteuen and twentieth of August, the Lord Generall prepared for fight, hauing newly receiued a supply of foureteen hundred Lances. But before that Mars should trie his strength by sword, hee sent vnto them a Generall pardon for all things that were past, which when they had againe vtterly reiecte, hee ranged his battels for fight. The Rebels likewise, set themselves in order, wherein the fore-ranke all the Gentlemen whom they had taken Prisoners, were placed and coupled in Irons for starting away, so that their dangers were doubled, and themselves exposed to death as well by their friends, as by their enemies.

(44) But before the charge could be giuen, one Miles a most skillfull Gunner amongst them made thor at the Kings Standard, and strucke the Bearer thereof in the thigh, and his horse through the shoulder, which so moued the Earle that hee caused a whole volly of Artillery to be discharged against them, when Captaine Drury with his owne band and the Almshouses, thrust fore vpon them, and opened their Battell, whereby most of the Captiue Gentlemen escaped away, vpon which brunt the Earles light horsemen came so valiantly on, that the Rebels gaue backe and fled: and with the formost Robert Ket their Captaine, vpon a swift horse galloped away, the Chafe continued three miles and more, with the slaughter of three thousand and five hundred rebels.

(45) Their battell thus broken, and the most part fled: those notwithstanding that kept about the Ordinance, determined to die like men, and inclosing themselves among the Carts and Carriages, had the aduantage of a Trench and certaine stakes stucke against the horsemen, whereby they stood more resolutely at defence. The Noble Earle pitying their case, and loath to loose so many braue men, sent Norrey King at Armes vnto them, with proffer of pardon if they would lay downe Armes, and returne to obedience, otherwise they well saw, there was no way but death: Their answer was, that they were free borne English men, who did disdain all ignominious death, wherunto they said, they were appointed, and barrels of ropes brought into the field (as they were informed) to strangle them, so that if they must needs die, they chose the manly deaths of Souldiers, not trusting the sugred promises for surprize, and then to be trussed vp like dogs.

(46) Their answer returned, and compassion still working in the Lord Generals breast, euen when hee had set his whole Army against them both of horse and foote; and the signe of battell ready to haue beene giuen, hee sent to them once more, to know if they would belicue and embrace their pardon, if hee came in person to declare it to them himselfe; wherunto they answered, that they knew him to be honourable, and would from his mouth most thankfully receiue it: thereupon hee repayed vnto them, and causing againe their pardon to be read, confirmed the same with such effectual words, as they all cast away their weapons, and with one voice cried, God saue King Edward.

(47) The day following, Ket the Captaine of this sedition, crept into a Barne of one M. Ribbes of Swanton, by two of his seruants apprehended, & with 20. horsemen conueied to Norwich, where 9. of the chiefest Rebels had iudgement of death; and were all of them hanged vpon the Oake of Reformation, which not till then, had the true note of that name. Ket with his brother William were brought vnto London, and thence backe againe into Norfolk, where William Ket the younger was hanged vpon the high Steeple of Windonham, and Robert Ket the Arch-Rebell in chaines vpon the Castell of Norwich, whose Citizens annually solemnized the day of their deliuey with no lesse ioy, then the Lewes did when they had escaped the sword of wicked Haman.

(48) These hazards set in the South, West, and East, the North likewise amongst them would come in for a calt, as forward and able to vndergoe rebellion, and their zeale as hore as any others, the occasion conceiued, was the Papall Religion abolished by Law, whose tottering toppie they meant to make steady by maine strength of Armes, notwithstanding the very foundations were so shrewdly vndermined. The place where this canker beganne was Seimer in the North-riding in Yorkshire spreading it selfe further into the East-riding also, & the first broachers of this giddy heady wine, were persons no better then William Ombler a Yeoman, Thomas Dale a Parrish Clerke, and one Steuenfon the Post, employed to blanch forth these businesse betwixt them.

(49) Their pretences were faire, as to restore the Church hier right, and to disburden the land of all grieuances imposed, this liring euer founding, that the Pope was the Man, that King Edward was an Intruder, if not a meere heretike, that the Church had the power of both the swords, which now vpon a blind prophesie they presupposed should be drawne against the King & his Nobles, whose times (as they beleueed) should bee no more, but that the land should be ruled by foure gouernours, when the Commons should meete in a Parliament assembled from the foure winds, which they interpreted from the foure Coasts of England, whereof themselves now made the last.

(50) First therefore to raise men, and to bring all into confusion, they fired their Beacons, whence the sparkes of sedition were carried amaine; for the ruder alwayes vnwilling to labour, and the fittest fewell to breake into flame, flocked together on heapes, each one hauing a Common-wealth in his head, and all of them disliking the reformation of religion that the King had commanded: Among these, the most seditious had euer a voice which drew content to forward the Action, and especially to beare downe the rich, whereof they made their first assay vpon white a Gentleman, Sauagea Marchant, Clapton and Berry, whom they cruelly murdered, and disposing them of their apparell left their naked bodies on the World before Seimer, thence passing forward from Towne to Town, tooke many away that were vnwilling to goe, and all too fulfill their perfidious prophesie.

(51) Their number now increased vnto three thousand, the Country beganne to grow in great feare, especially the Gentlemen, and the richer sort, seeing their liues and substance thus thifted for and sought after; but presently downe came the kings pardon with proffers of life, which so willingly was embraced, that Ombler & Dale were quite forsaken, & almost left alone, who with Wright, Peasecke, Weatherell, and Buttry were worthily executed at Torke vpon the one and twenty of September following.

(52) As the Commons by these tumultuous rebellions greatly diquieted the peace of the land, so the chiefest Lords did disturb the Court of the young King, where the greatest Counsellors through emulation and disdaine, banded each against others, without respect of themselves, or regard of their Soueraigne; whereof the Kings vnclies, the Protector and Admirall are noted for the first, and with the first paid their offences with their liues: they both were the brethren of Queene Jane the Kings mother deceased; the elder Lord Edward Duke of Sommerfet was Protector of his Person, Realmes and Dominions. And Thomas Lord Seamer Baron of Sadley the younger, high Admirall of England, both worthy persons, had they known their owne worths: for so long stood they in safety of life and true honor as the bounds of brotherhood and nature stood vnviolated betwixt them; but that once broken, their liues lay open to dishonour and death.

(53) The younger brother Lord Thomas had married Queene Katherine Paree, the last of the many wiues of King Henry the eight; who vndoubtedly bore himselfe no meaner by that match, neither she the state or name of a Dowager Queene: though of herselfe a woman complete with singular humility. And the Dutcheffe of Sommerfet matched with the greatest Peere in the Land, held her State equall to her husbands degree: and for place and precedence, as report hath diuulged, the lamentable tragédie of these two great Brethren beganne; which now in acting brought vpon the Stage at once their owne destructions, the lands rebellions, and the griefes of the good young King, into a fatal and vnrecoverable sicknesse, whereof lastly followed his death.

(54) So subtle is the old Serpent, and so ready euer to sow tares among wheate, that hee disturbed religions proceedings with all these calamities almost at one times, first setting matters of discord betwixt them, by scandalizing tongues, then icalousies of suspitions spiced with enuie; and lastly hatred vnto death. Inomuch that the Protector suffered his brother to bee accused and condemned in Parliament of high Treason (whether true or false God onely knoweth) and vnder his owne hand writing, committed his head to the axe: whereby one of the 3 twisted cords of Englands strength was cut asunder by that fatal and vnhappy stroke, and his owne now made looke in the Cable, proued too weak to beare to hold fast the Anchor, whereby the shipwracke of his owne life was shortly made.

(55) The Lord Admirals inditement was, that hee had purposed to destroy the young King, and to translate the Crowne vnto himselfe, as standeth recorded in Statute made the third of this Kinges Raigne, for which the twenty of March he suffered death vpon the Tower-hills, which as many supposed that it was the Dutches of Sommerfets doings; so the wifer sort feared, it would bee the ruine of her husband and the Duke, the experiment whereof had often beene approued, and indeed was too fatally linked as it chanced in these two brethren.

(56) For the Admirall being made away by order of law, the giddy Commons without either order, or law, rose vp in their Insurrections as hath been said: And the Lords returned from their suppressions, beganne forthwith to enuy and article against the Protector, which they published by Proclamation against him, wherein hee was accused, 1. of euill gouernment: 2. the losse of the kings Peers in France: 3. to be ambitious in his buildings, 4. regardlesse of the Counsellors: 5. a fower of sedition amongst the Nobles: 6. dangerous to the King: 7. a scandalizer of the Councell, 8. and lastly, that hee was no lesse then a Traitor. Against whom they desired the aid of the Londoners to take from him the Kings to all which seuentene Counsellors subscribe their names.

(57) These Statists in consultation dayly at London, and the Protector residing still with the King, intercourse of letters were interchangeably both lent and receiued, whereof two, from either part one, and euen at one instant were sent vnto the Lord Maior and and Citizens of London, requiring their aide in these their opposite quarrels, and surely in their assembly the talk of the Lords by the Recorder was so wel tolde, as had not a graue Citizen stept vp betimes, the common Councill had granted aid against their King, whose wisdom and loyalty, in regarde my selfe a Citizen, would haue it recorded to his euerlasting memory, and an example and motive for our obedient loue and duty toward our Soueraignes. I will inferre as I find them vttered and spoken.

(57) In this case (said hee) good it is to thinke "on things past, to auoide the danger of things to come, for I remember a story written by Fabian "in his Chronicles of the warres betwixt the King "and his Barons, who euen then as our Lords doe "now, demanded aid of the Maior and Commons "of London, against their Soueraigne King Henry "the third, and that in a cause rightfull, and good "for the Common-weale, which was the execution "of certain whole some lawes, somewhat derogating "from his princely prerogative, which hee would "not permit. The aide was granted, and quarrell "came vnto battell, wherein the Lords preuailed, "and tooke the King and his sonne prisoners. But "they againe restored to liberty, among other con- "ditions this was one, that the King should not "onely grant his free pardon to the Lords, but also "vnto the Citizens of London, which was done, yea "and the same confirmed by Parliament. But what "followed? was it forgotten? no surely, nor ne- "uer forgiven during the Kings life: for the liber- "ties of the City were taken away, strangers appoin- "ted to bee our heads and Gouernours, the Citi- "zens giuen away both body and goods, and from "one persecution to another, were most miserably "afflicted: such it is to enter the wrath of a Prince, "which (as Salomon saith) is death: Wherefore, for- "asmuch as this aide is required of the Kings Maie- "sty, whose voice (being our high Shepheard) wee "ought to obey, rather then to hearken to the "Lords, whom neuertheless I wish not to bee vt- "terly cast off, my counsell is, that they with vs, "and wee with them, become humble Petitioners "vnto his Highnesse, that it would please him to "heare such complaints against the Lord Protector, "as may be iustly alledged and proued, and I doubt "not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither "shall the King, nor yet the Lordes haue cause to "seeke for further aide, neither we to offend any of "them both.

(58) These words well weighed, and the Councell dissolved, six hundred Londoners were prepared in a readinesse: for Sir Philip Hobby being sent from the Lords to the King, so deliuered their minds, that the Lord Protector was commanded out of presence, and the next day being the twelfth of October, the Lords of the Councell referred to Windsor, where they so wrought with the King, as his vncke was deliuered into their hands, whom the same night they imprisoned in Beauchamps Tower in the same Castell, and the next day strongly attended, brought him to London, whence the streetes were guarded only by householders, the Aldermen taking the charge of the busines, and so to the great griefe and wondering of the people hee was conueyed to the Tower, and there left.

(59) Whither shortly after the Lords themselves repaired, and charged the Protector with these 20. Articles as followeth.

- 1 That at his entry into that weighty office, hee was expressly prohibited to doe any thing in State without the assent of the last Kings Executors.
- 2 That hee had contrariwise vpon his owne authority both subuerbed lawes, and staied iustice, as well by letters, as commendement.
- 3 That hee had deliuered diuers persons arrested, and committed to prison for felonie, manslaughter, murder and treason, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

4 That hee had made Captains and Lieutenants ouer weighty affaires vnder his owne Seale and Writing.

5 That hee had alone communicated with forraigne Ambassadors about most weighty State affaires.

6 That hee had checked diuers of the Kings Priuy Councell, speaking for the good of the State, yea and threatened to displace them if they consented not to his mind.

7 That hee had against law erected a Court of Requests in his owne house, wherby were enforced diuers of the Kings Subiects to answere for their Free-holds.

8 That hee had for money disposed Offices in the Kings gift, money, leases, and Wardes, and giuen presentations of Benefices, and Bishoprickes, yea and meddled with sale of the Kings lands, which by office hee could not, without consent of the maior voice of the Councell.

9 That hee had commanded multiplication by Alcumistrie to the abuse of the Kings coine.

10 That against the King and Councels will, hee had set forth a Proclamation against inclosures, which had caused dangerous insurrections in the land, wherein diuers of the Kings liege Subiects haue bene spoiled, and many a worthy man therein slaine.

11 That to the same end hee had giuen commiffion with Articles annexed concerning inclosures of Commons, high wayes, and decayed Cottages, giuing the Commissioners authority to heare and determine the same causes, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

12 That hee had suffered Rebels and traitours to assemble, and lie in Campe and Armour, against the King, his Nobles, & Gentlemen, without any speedy suppressing of them.

13 That by his gifts in money, with promises of Fees, rewards and seruices, hee had encouraged many of the said rebels.

14 That in fauour of them contrary to law hee had caused a Proclamation to bee made, that none of the said Rebels, or Traitors should be sued, or vexed for any of their offences committed in the said Rebellion.

15 That hee had liked well of these rebellions, and had said that the courtesies of the Gentry gaue the occasion, affirming that it was better for the Commons to die, then to perish for lacke of liuing.

16 That hee had reported the Lords of the Parliament were loath to reform themselves for the reformation of Inclosures, and therefore the people had good cause to reforme the thinges themselves.

17 That vpon thereport of the defaults and lacks of Bulloigne nothing was there amended.

18 That the Forts of Newhaven and Blacknesse standing in want of men and victuall, whereof hee was informed, were suffered notwithstanding still to want, to the great encouragement of the French, and dishonour of the English.

19 That hee had vntuly published, that the Lords at London minded to destroy the King, which hee instantly desired hee would neuer forget, and to that end infligated many young Lords, whereby sedition and discord was made among the Nobles.

20 Lastly, that whereas the Lords assembled at London, onely to consult vpon a charitable communication to be had with the Protector for his misgouernment of the King and Realme, hee contrariwise sent letters of credence to many places and persons, that the said Lords were no lesse then high Traitors to the King, and great disturbers of the whole realme.

All these accusations notwithstanding (the young King so labouring in) he was released from the Tower the sixt of February following vnto his free liberty, though not vnto his former authority, and so remained remained vntouched for the space of two yeeres and two dayes.

(61) Whilest these his and other troubles were commencing in England, the Lord Grey of Wilton left Lieutenant of the North, remained in Scotland, where many feates of warre were vndergone, and many Forts fortified, and some taken, such were Lewden, Haddington, and Telfer, at whose assault certaine opprobrious speeches in most contemptuous manner were vttered by a Scottish man against King Edward of England, whereat the Lord Grey was so offended, as vpon composition for the deliuerie of the Castell, all were let goe with life, onely that person excepted, and his name knowne to bee Newton, was appointed to die for the same; but hee denying the words, imposed them vpon one Hamilton, a man valorous inough, and wrongfully touched, who denied the accusation, and challenged Newton the combat, which hee accepted, and in performance slew Hamilton, though more at disaduantage then for lacke either of courage or strength: The victor was rewarded with a great chaine of gold, and the gowne that the Lord Grey wore at the present, though many maligned and accused him still to bee the vtterer of those base words.

(62) The English keeping foot still in Scotland, burnt Dunkeith and Muskelburgh, and fortified Haddington both with munition and men, spoyling the Country, with Bishoppe Lesly, all about Edenburgh, Lowthian and Mers: repairing of Forts, and placing of Garrisons, as if they meant there to remaine and abide: but their young Queene being conuainced into France, and the Scots aided with the assistance of the French, so quite themselves, that they voided their land of the English, and recovered of them all they had lost. In which times of variable successe, the King but a child, the Nobles at vari- ances, and the French sought to recouer the holds that the English had in their Country, and first by stealth meant to surpris the fortress of Bulloigneberg, vnto which enterprise seven thousand were chosen, vnder the conduct of Monsieur Chastillon.

(63) These secretly marching in the night with ladders and furniture meete for the enterprise, approached within a quarter of a mile vnto Bullingberg fort, amongst whom was an English Soldier discharged out of their pay, for that hee had taken a French woman to wife. This Carter for so was his name got entertainment vnder Chastillon, and now vnder- standing whereabouts they went, hastily made from his Company, and gaue the Alarm to his Coun- trimen within the Fort; where Sir Nicholas Arnald Captaine of the peece, caused him to bee drawne vp betwixt two pikes to the height of the wall, vnto whom hee declared the attempt in hand, & among them stood so valiantly in defence of the fort, that hee gaue many a wound, and received some himself: by him and this meane the Peece was quit from surprisall, and the slaughter of the French so great that fiftene Wagons went laden away with dead Corps.

(64) This losse sustained, and the English masters in those parts of their Maine, the French sought to free fortune for their Isles in the Seas, namely Garnesey and Tessey, posset and subiect to King Edwards Crowne, their preparations were great, and their Marshallists many; which notwithstanding with such losse were beaten backe from their bankes, as a thousand men at Armes were slaine in the attempt, & the successe so vnfortunate, as the French for feare of further discouragement forbad the report, and made an inhibition, not to mention the expedition of that iourney.

(65) Neuertheless the French King ceased not his desired purposes, till hee had got by surrender Hambletowne, Blacknesse, Bulloigneberg, and the town of Bulloigne it selfe, though bought at a deare rate, and deliuered with great griefe to the English; vnto such a lamentable state, and dishonourable compo- sition was the good King Edward brought, by the bandings of his great Counsellors, and insurrections of his vnuly Commons; after which calamities a great and mortall disease followed, namely the sweating sicknesse, that ragged extremely through the land, wherein died the two sonnes of Charles Brandon, both of them Dukes of Suffolke, besides an infinite number of men in their best strengths, which followed onely Englishmen in forraigne Countrey, no other people infected therewith, wherby they were both feared and thunned in all places where they came.

(66) And to fill vp the dolours of these dolefull times, the good Duke of Somerset was againe apprehended, euen when the least suspicion was of any vndirect workings: for vpon his first releasement, to linke a firme loue betwixt him and the potent Earle of Warwicke, his most malignant; a marriage was contracted betwixt the Lord Lisle his eldest sonne & heire, and the Lady the Earles eldest daughter, which was solemnized with great ioy at Sheene, in presence of the young King; this amity was out- wardly carried with all faire shewes for a time, though inward hatred lay secretly hid, as by the sequell in- continentlie appeared: for after a solemne creation of many Estates, wherein the Earle of Warwicke had his style raised to bee Duke of Northumberland, vnto whose rayes at that time most of the Courtiers cast their eyes: the sparkes of emulation began pre- sently to breake forth; where the simplicity of the one gaue aduantage to the other, to compasse that which long had bene sought.

(67) The Duke of Somerset not well aduised, and yielding too much vnto Sycophant flatteries, was put in feare of some foudaine attempt intended against him, and therefore counsellied to wear vnder his garment a coate of defence, which hee accordingly did, and being so armed came vnto the Councell Table, supposing no man had known of any such thing; but his bolome being opened and the Armour perceiued, hee was forthwith apprehended, as intending the death of some Counsellor, and by Northumberland so vehemently taxed (who in Councell was euer the principall man) that hee was forthwith attached, and sent to the Tower, vpon the sixteenth of October with the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Partridge, and the next day the Dutcheffe his wife was likewise committed; all of them for suspicion of treason and felonie; and hee standing so indited vpon the *second of December following, was arraigned at Westminster, attended with the Axe of the Tower, Billes, Halberds, and Pollaxes a great number.

(68) His inditement was for treason and felony, and the same virged vnto extremity, with many am- plifications, and bitter iniectiues, especially that hee had sought and pretended the deaths of the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord Marqueffe, and Pembroke: where after many mild answers to these matters obiected, he put himselfe to be tried by his Peeres, who acquitted him of treason, but found the inditement of felonie: when presently the Axe was commaunded away, whereat the shout of the people shewed the great affection that was borne to the Duke: little mistrusting that the sentence of death was pronounced against him, or that the kings vncke should die as a felon; neither did the Statute intend any such thing as some are of opinion, but rather was purposely made for the suppression of re- bellions, and vnlawfull assemblies, wherein such as should seeke or procure the death of any Counsellor should be guilty as in case of felonie. But such was the pleasure of the all ordering power, that hee which knew no theft should die for that sinne, so that nei- ther himselfe, nor his wisest Counsellors deman- ded the benefite of his Clergy which would haue sa- ued his life if it had bene required.

(69) His sentence thus pronounced, hee was againe sent backe to the Tower, wherein he kept a very sad Christmas, yea and that in the Court, inclined to little mirth, the King lamenting the condemnation of his vnclie, had not some witty disportes broke off his passions, which how, and by whom they proceeded, let others report, and vs continue the Tragedie of this Duke; who vpon the two & twenty of February following being Friday was brought to the Scaffold vpon Tower-hill, by eight in the morning, where turning himselfe towards the East, he spake to the people, as followeth.

(70) *Dearely beloued friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I neuer offended against the King, neither in word nor deed, and haue alwayes been as faith-full and true vnto this Realme, as any man hath been; but for much as I am by law condemned to die, I doe acknowledge my selfe as well as others to be subiect therun-to: wherefore to testifie mine obedience which I owe to the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, whereunto
I willingly offer my selfe with most hearty thanks vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might through sodaine death haue taken away my life, that I neither should haue acknowledged him nor my selfe.*

(71) These words vttered, besides others exhortatory, that the people would continue constant in the Gospell, fodaynly was heard a great noyse, whereby the assembly was stricken into great feare, some thinking that a storme or tempest descended from aboue, some supposed that the barrels of Gunpowder in the Armore had taken fire, & were all blowne vp into the Aire, others thought that they heard a noyse of horses prepared to battell, some againe affirmed confidently that it did thunder, and others thought verily it was an earth-quake, and that the ground moued: vnto such confusion and terrour were they presently brought, which (saith Stow) was none other, but that certaine men from the Hamlets warned with weapon to guard the Tower-hill, came thither somewhat after the hower appointed, whose formost seeing the Prisoner on the Scaffold, beganne to runne forward themselves, and call to their fellows to come away: which word away sounding as an Echo in the peoples eares, they thought that rescue had come to the Duke to take him away: and seeing the Bil-men to make forward so fast, beganne themselues to shrinke backe from the hill, euery man seeking to saue one, and by this accident and confusion, this feare among them fell and beganne:
This stirre scarce ended, another ensued by the running of the people towards the Scaffold, who seeing Sir Anthony Browne riding thitherward, supposed a pardon had come from the King, so that a sodaine shout arose, a pardon, a pardon, God saue the King: by which it onely appeared in what loue hee was had,
and how much his life was desired of the Commons.

(72) The Duke whose mind being altogether prepared for death, was little moued either to hope or feare, and thereupon addressed his second speech to the people, and with no dejected countenance spake againe and said: *Beloued friends there is no such matter intended as you vainly hope and believe: It seemeth thus good to the Almighty, vnto whose ordinance it is meet that wee all bee obedient, wherefore I pray you bee quiet and without tumult, for I am quiet, and let vs toyne in prayer vnto the Lord for the preservation of our Noble King, vnto whose Maiesty I wish continuall health, with all felicitie and abundance of prosperous success.
Moreover, I wish to his Counsellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule all things uprightly with Iustice, vnto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to shew your selues obedient, the which is also very necessarie for you vnder paine of condemnation, and also most pre-suable for the preservation of the Kings Maiesty. And thereupon asking euery man forgiveness, freely forgaue euery man against him, and desiring the people to bee quiet, lest the flesh should be troubled, though his spirit was willing, hee meekely laide downe his* head to the Axe, and receiued at one stroke his rest by death.

(73) Howsoever this Dukes cause was balanced by law, and him taken away that stood betwixt some and their Sunne; yet was his death heauily digested by the people, that spake very bitterly against the Duke of Northumberland; but most especially the young King forer mourned, and soone missed the life of his Protector thus vnexpectedly taken away, who now deprived of both his vnclies, howsoever
the times were passed with pastimes, playes and shewes, to driue away dumpees, yet euer the remembrances of them late so neere vnto his heart, that lastly he fell sicke of a Cough, which grievously increased ending with a consumption of the lungs.

(74) His sickness continuing with great doubt of his life, vpon purpose saith Grafton to alter the succession of the Crowne, three marriages were in one day solemnized, whereof the first was betwixt the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth sonne to the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lady Lane, eldest daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke: the second was betwixt the Lord Herbert, sonne and heire to William Earle of Pembroke, and the Lady Katherine the younger daughter of the said Duke of Suffolke, and the third was betweene Henry L. Hastings, sonne and heire of Frances Earle of Huntington, and Katherine the youngest daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which tending (saith he) to the disorder of the rightfull heires, they proved nothing prosperous, for two of them were presently made fruitlesse, the one by death, and the other by dissolue.

(75) The policy established, and languishing sick-nesse of the King gaue way vnto such, as sought the euerion of the State, & alienation of the Crowne: In whose eye no head was scene fitter for that faire Diademe, then was Guilford Brice, Iane the elder daughter of Suffolke, whose mother Lady Francis then liuing, was the daughter of Mary the French Queen, the younger sister to King Henry the eight, vnto whom King Edward ouer-wrought in his weakness, ordained his Crowne by Will, at the suggestions of such Politiques, as meant to deriuer the two law-full Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, and to impugn the Statute, in case provided for the succession of K.
Henry the eight his children: vnto which Will (O griefe to heare) subscribed all the Kings Councill, most of the Nobility, the reuerend Bishops, and all the Iudges of the land, one onely excepted, euen Sir James Hales knight, a Iustice of the common Pleas, vp-right in iudgement, & a fauourer of the Gospell, he, I say, neuer would write or consent to the disheri-ting of the Lady Mary.

(76) The King thus accomplishing what his Statists had wrought, lay languishing in his faintnes:
the end wherefore could not be expected but onely
by death, and now being worne almost to nothing (his last breath drawing to the limits of Nature) he lift vp his eyes with a prepared heart, and prayed as followeth.

*Lord God deliuer mee out of this miserable and wretched life, and take me among thy chofen: howbeit not my will but thy will be done; Lord I commit my spirit to thee: O Lord thou knowest how happy it were for mee to be with thee: yes for thy chofen sake, if it bee thy will send, me life and health that I may truly serue thee: O my Lord blese thy people and saue thine inheritance: O Lord God saue thy chofen people of England:
O my Lord God defend this Realme from Papisrie, and maintaine thy true religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy name for thy sonne Iesus Christs sake.*

So turning his face, and seeing some by him faide,
I thought you had not bene so wigh: yes, said Doctor
Owen, we heard you speake to your selfe; then said the King, I was praying to God: O I am faine, Lord haue mercy vpon me, and receiue my spirit: and in so saying, gaue vp the Ghost, to the great losse of England, in whom they had conceived most hopes.

most Princes, and vices so few, that none can be taxed with lesse; very learned (according to his yeeres)
he was in the Latine and Greeke tongues, the French, Spanish, and Italian, yea (saith Hieronymus Car-danus) he was adorned with the skill of Logicke, naturall Philosophie, and Musike, and for Astronomy (saith
he) my selfe had experience, whom he learnedly opposed of the cause and course of Comets: for Humanity, he is the very Image of Morality, and in princely graue Maiesty best becoming a King: briefly, hee may well seem to be a miracle in Nature: nor doe I speake thus Rhetorically to amplify things, or to make them more truthful, for the truth is more then I do utter: and in this hee was most admirable, that hee could tell and recite all the Ports, Hauens, and Creekes, nor within his owne Realme onely, but also in Scotland, and likewise in France, what comming in there was, how the tide serued in euery of them, what burden of Shippe, and what winde best serued the comming in to them.

(78) Of all his Nobles, Gentry, Iustices, and Magistrates, he tooke speciall name of their Hospitality, and religious conuersations, and that which is best accepted of a Prince, hee was very liberall, louing, mercifull, meeke and gentle towards his people, and so farre from bloud, as hee euer fauoured and spared as much as might bee the life of man, yea euen of Rebels, as wee haue scene; neither was hee willing to put Hereticks to death, as in a certaine differtation had once with M.
Cheeke appeared: in somuch that when Iohn Burcher should be burned for her hereticke, all the Coun-cell could not moue him to fet his hand to the warrant of her execution, vntill D. Cramer his Godfather, Archbishoppe of Canterbury laboured to induce him, vnto whom hee said, what my Lord? will you haue me to send her quicke to hell, and taking the pen vnto this speech: I will lay all the charge hereupon Cramer before God. Then how his hand had bene gotten for his vnclies death is to bee admired.

(79) But his constancy vnto Christs Gospell, with the abandoning of all superstition, was very admirable, one example among many wee will not let to dechte. Lady Mary his sister through the suito of Charles the Emperour, made great meanes to haue Masse said in her house, and that to bee done withoutall preiudice of law: the greatnesse of her Person being the immediate successor, and the might of the Emperour in amitie with England, moued the Councill to giue their consent to the suit; to forward which Cramer Archbishoppe of Canterbury accompanied with Ridley Bishoppe of London were employed from them to the King, who hearing their message, gaue the replication so grounded vpon Scripture, as they gaue ouer to vrgo more that way:
but like Politicians alledged the danger in breach of amity with the Emperour, to which the King answered, hee would rather aduenteure the hazard of his own life then to grant that which was not agreeable to the truth. The Bishops yet vrged him with the bonds of nature, and submissiue said, they would haue no say: the King seeing himselfe so importunated, burst into weeping, and fobblingly defired them to be content, whereat the teares so abundantly burst from their eyes, as they departed his presence not able to speake. And for a further relitymony of this yong Kings zeale, reade if you please a letter sent vnto his sister the Princess Lady Mary, out of the original.

(80) Right deare, and right entirely beloued sister we greet you well, and let you know that it grieueth vs much to perceiue no amendment in you of that, which wee for good cause, your soules health, our conscience, and common tranquillity of our Realme haue so long desired, assuring you, that our sufferance hath more demonstration of natural loue then contentation of our conscience, and foresight of our safety. Wherefore although you giue occasion as much almost as in you is, to diminish our natural loue; yet wee loath to seele it decay, and meane not to bee so carelesse of you as wee bee provoked. And therefore meaning your weale, and therewith ioyning a care not to be found guilty in our own conscience to God, hauing cause to require forgiveness that wee haue so long for respect of loue towards you omitted our bounden duty, we do send at this present our right trusty, & right welbeloued Counsellor the L. Rich, our Chancellor of England, our trusty and right welbeloued Counsellor Sir Anthony Wingfield Knight, Comptroller of our Household, and Sir Will. Peter Knight, one of our two principall Secretaries in message to you touching the order of your house, willing you to giue the same credite in those things they shall say to you from vs, & do therein our name. Teouen vnder our Signet at the Castle of Windsor, the of in the fift yeare of our Raigne, 1556.

(81) The fruites of which Religion this godly King shewed by his workes of compassion towards the poore, & that especially vpon the foundation of Christs Hospitall, the late suppressed place of the Grey Friars in London, and that vpon occasion as fol-loweth. It chanced the reuerend Bishop Doctor Ridley to preach before his Maiesty at Westminster, wherein hee Christianlike exhorted the rich to be merciful vnto the poore, and to that end amplified the words of the Text against the merciflesse rich, and the negligence of such as were in great place. The Sermon ended, and the King set to dinner, hee sent to the Bishop, commanding him not to depart the Court, before hee knew his further pleasure, and thereupon causing two Chaires to be set in the Gallery, all others auoided, hee compelled the Bishoppe to sit downe by his side, and in no wise would admitte him to bee vncouered.

(82) Where entering conference, hee first gaue him
heartie thanks for his Sermon, repeating vnto him
the chiefe points thereof, and coming to his exhortation for the poore, he then told him that he thought himselfe first touched in the speech; for saide he, my Lord you speake to them in authority, whereof vnder God
I am the chiefe, and must first make answer to him if I be negligent, and therefore I thinke you principally meant me: Gods commendement I know most expressly inioyneth vs to haue compassion of his poore members, for whom we must make account; and truly my Lord I am most willing to trauell that way, not doubting but that your long approved learning and wisdom, whose zeale is such as wiseth themselues, but that also you had conference with others what is best herein to be done, which I am also desirous to know, and therefore I pray I freely your mind.

(83) The mouer vnto these pious considerations little looking for such questions of the Prince, fate a while silent, ouerjoyed at his words, and lastly vn-prepared of any present instructions, told the King that the Citizens of London were best able to direct the plot, whose great Charity, and well ordered gouernement, besides their daily charges, being ouerburdened with poore, had sufficient experience, and if it would please his Maiesty to direct his letters vnto them himselfe, he would be very ready to further this godly resolution so far as his means might any wise extend: whereupon the King presently commanded his letters to be writ, and would not suffer the Bishoppe to depart before himselfe had thereto fet his hand and signet, desiring him to deli-uer the same to the Lord Maior, and with him to conferre about this bulineffe, which hee wished might be accomplished with all expedition.

(84) The Bishoppe as ready as the King was desirous, posted apace to the Lord Maior of London, where deliuering the letter, offered his assistance to forward the worke, and they together with some Aldermen, and twenty foure Commoners agreee vpon three degrees of the poore, and them diuided again into nine.

(85) The Booke thus drawne, and presented to the King, he thereupon desired to be accounted the chiefe Founder of their reliefe, and forthwith gaue vnto the City S. Bartholomewes Hospitall by Smithfield, and the Grey Friars Church neere adioyning

(87) Now as this godly King was carefull in redeeming the time, so likewise to take as it were an account of himselfe, hee kept a tournall booke or Record written with his owne hand, how all things proceeded with him, and with the State, euen from the first day of his raigne vnto his death: whose many vertues as they were inferior to none of his worthy Progenitors, and zeale little short to the best Kings of Judah; so was hee soone mist of all his loyall Subjects, when the bosome of Gods Saints were opened to the persecutors sword.

(89) He died at Greenwich vpon Thursday the sixt day of Iuly, the yeare of Christ Iesus, one thousand five hundred fifty three, and the seuententh of his age, when hee had reigned sixe yeeres five months, and nine daies, and was buried vpon the ninth of August following, in the Chappell of *S. CHAPTER XXIII.

ING EDWARDS life ended by his lingering disease, and the Stateme intending to establish his will, for the space of two daies his death was kept secret, and much consultation among the Nobility had of the businesse; all of them affecting the election of Iane, lest Mary should vndoe what Edward had done; to support which purpose, many projects were cast, and many opinions given how to proceed, yet all iointlie light in this point, that London was the hand which must reach Iane the Crowne: whose Citizens assistance if they might be got, the greatest difficulty (as they held it) was halfe vndergone. And therefore to mould them for Iane, and to marre them for Mary, the Councell sent for the L. Maior of London, sixe Aldermen, and twelue Commoners Marchants.

(2) These comming to the Court, were secretly certified of King Edward his death, where his Will declared, and Letters Patents shewed for the disinheriting of his two sisters, and the raising of Suffolkes daughter vnto the Crowne, whose religion was so zealous, and vertues so many (as in truth no Princeesse was possessed with more) were so well set forth by these graue Counsellors, that the Lord Maior and Citizens took their othes for Lady Iane, vnto whose obedience they promised to secure the City.

(3) Lady Marie at Houesdon hearing these newes, presentlie remoued to her Mannor of Keningall in Norfolke: from whence shee wrote her letters vnto the Lords of the Councell, wherein shee maruellet that her brothers death should so long be kept from her:

The Lord Maior
and Citizens
sworne to Lady Iane.

Lady Marie writeth to the Lords

E e e e e 2 her:

her: that shee being the Princeesse next in blood, ordained by act of Parliament, and King Henries Testament to succede, her right enrowled in the Records, by the authority of her Father and brother, their owne knowledge and prescription to her most rightfull Titles, yet now in consultation to vndoe these prouisions both against God and naturall allegiance; shee could not but maruell, and rather would continue for some politike consideration, and take them in the best part, then to possesse the least thought of any disloyalty in them; and therefore willed them vpon the receipte of her letters to proclaime her Queene, and gouernour of the Realme, in the Citie of London, and in other publike places, as in such cause appertaineth, with all due obseruances, as they tendered her displeasure and their owne safeties: this letter was signed at the Mannor of Keningall vnder her Signet the ninth of Iuly 1553.

The Lords answer to Lady Maries Letter.

(4) Vnto which letters the Lords forthwith made answer; first signifying that by good warrant of ancient Lawes of the Land, besides the will of their last King, confirmed vnder his hand and broad Seale, in the presence of the most part of the Nobles, Counsellors, Iudges and other graue personages, assenting and subscribing to the same, that Lady Iane daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke should bee inuested and succeed him in the Emperiall Crowne: vnto whom therefore, and vnto none other, they must giue their loyall subiection, where also they put her in minde of the vnlawfull marriage and diuorfe of her mother, her owne illegitimation, vncapable of Crowne, or rule of Dominions, willing her further to desist from any such claime, and to submit her selfe vnto Queene Iane now her Soueraigne, so would they hold amity with her, els should shee prouoe greuous vnto them and her selfe, which letters were sent from the Tower of London the ninth of Iuly 1553, and subscribed by the hands of such as follow.

M. Fox Act.

The Suffolke men the first that came to aide Mary.

Iane Proclaime Queene.

A.D. 1553. Iuly 10.

(5) These Letters receiued, and the Lords mindes therein made knowne, shee forthwith removed to Fremingham Castle, standing more safe from inuasion or easie access, vnto whom the Suffolke men were the first that resorted, offering their seruice vnto her rightfull cause, with condition they might still embrace the Gospell in the same manner as King Edward had established it, to which the confidenced, though afterwards wearing the Diademe, and petitioned vnto for promise, shee both punished the Writer and answered their expectations, that they should one day well know, they being but members should not direct her their Head.

(6) The Lords at London set for their enterprise vpon foot, by proclamation made knowne in most parts of the City, the death of King Edward, and that by Will, hee had bequeathed his Crowne and Dominions, to the vertuous great Princeesse, Lady Iane, daughter to Henrie Duke of Suffolke (as we haue said) and so was shee proclaimed by the name of Queene Iane, though many of the Commons wished it had bene Queene Mary; and for some words spoken to that purpose, one Gilbort Post a servant Vintner, vpon the Pillory lost both his cares. Vnto the aide of Lady Marie came the Earles of Suffolke, Bath and Oxford the Lord Westworth, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Henrie Termingham, Sir William Walgrave, with diuers others of Norfolk and Suffolke; yea and the Citizens of Norwich themselves, hauing certaine knowledge of King Edwards death, forthwith proclaimed Marie for Queene, and presently sent her aide both of men and munition. The Lords then hearing of great preparations, meant by times to ouermatch her in power, and thereupon agreed that Henrie Duke of Suffolke their new Queenes Father should with an Army repaire into Norfolk, which thing was so greuous vnto Lady Iane his daughter, that with floods of teares shee obtained his stay.

(7) None then was held fitter to vndergoe this great businesse, then was the Duke of Northumberland, young Giffords Father, (who belides his lonnes dignity vnto whom this new Queene was wife) his valiant parts and sufficiency to marshall an Army in Field had been often experienced in Scotland, & but lately among these people with whom hee was now to deale. The Duke thus appointed, began as it should seeme, to mistrust the worst, and thereupon freely vttered his minde to the Lords; willing them to be carefull at home, as hee would bee venturous abroad, for their cause was common, and all for the Queene. Hee with his (hee said) went now to venture their bodies to the bloody strokes of warre, their Families and Children left to the dispose of others, whom as he told them if they meant not faire plaie, he could not auoide as well as any: thus much and more spoken to the like purpose, one of the Lords replied, and said: Your Grace (as I iudge) doth cast this doubt ouer farre, for which of vs all, can wash our hands cleane of this businesse, therefore it behoueth vs to be resolute, as much as it doth you, and among them Arundell wished that he might goe with him.

(8) All things in a readinesse, and his commission confirmed vnder the broad Seale of England; vpon the 14. of Iuly the Duke with fixe hundred men, accompanied with the Lord Grey, and others, set forth of London, and tooke his way through Shordich where beholding the countenances of the people, hee spake to the Lord Grey and said. The people, my Lord, praise still to see vs, but not one of them bids vs God speede: the same day likewise Sir John Gates went after the Duke, both of them making for New market, whither further supplies were promised to bee sent.

(9) In the meane time the Lord Windsor, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drury, and Sir Edward Hastings raised the Commons of Buckinghamshire, proclaiming Queene Marie euers as they went, the like did Sir John Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine in Oxfordshire, and so did Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton: these with many more made forward toward Norfolk, vnto whom many more ioined in the way: and as God and good hap brought it to passe, fixe tall Ships well manned that were appointed before Yarmouth to haue taken Lady Marie if shee had fled; were by foule weather driuen into the Hauen, where master Termingham was raising for her, and taking a Boate to halle them, the Sea-souldiers demanded what he would haue, his answer was their Captaines, whereunto the Souldiers consented, threatening to throw them into the Sea, if they refused to serue Queene Marie: the Shippes thus gorten and their number augmented, their terror grew fearfull to the Lords in the Tower: whose Tenants began then likewise to draw backe, and deny them their aide: so that certaine of them would faine haue bene gone, if by any means they could haue escaped the Tower, which the Lord Treasurer assaid, but was brought acke againe about midnight.

John Stow.

(10) The Duke of Northumberland in as great feare as any,ooke still his stations according to his Commission, sending still to the Lords for their promised supplies, betwix whom were such posting of letters, such speeding to and fro, such outward faire promises, such inward priuie practises, such talking of the Souldiers, and such heere-burning of the people, as it was a world to see: and the rumour of Souldiers from all quarters daily resorting vnto Queene Marie, made the turmoile much the more. To leaue therefore nothing vnassaid that might support their newe made Queene Iane, the Councell commanded Doctor Ridley Bishop of London, to maintaine her cause in his Sermon made at Pauls Crosse, which hee did vpon Sunday the sixteenth of Iuly, but that neither working, nor the peoples affection drawne from the rightfull Successor, the Lords fell from the Duke, who then was in Burie; and in London proclaimed Lady Mary Queene.

(11) This sudden alteration brought many sudden feares into the Dukes breast, whose onlie way, as he well saw, was to follow the streame, and now returning to Cambridge his Souldiers began to turne in affection, most of them forsaking his company, a few onely excepted, whose perils were deeply engaged with his, where to shew his forwardnesse for the aduancement of Marie, wanting both Trumpet and Herald at hand, himselfe accompanied with the Maior, and the Marquesse of Northampton, in the Market place proclaimed her Queene: which done in token of ioy, hee threw vp his owne Cap. And thus the right reuerent to whom it belonged, wee will now adresse our stile to her dreadfull Raigne, wherein the Kingdomes story may seeme to be writ rather with blood then with inke, and the nursing mother, (as Queenees by the Prophet are termed and called) to forget the natural affection due to her Subiects which in some sort may bee compared to the children of her wombe.

(12) Yet were her beginnings both milde and gentle, pardoning all offenders in case of Lady Iane; excepting the Duke of Northumberland, the onely doer, and Sir John Gates, Captaine of the Guard, who was in Armes against her, with some few others that worthily suffered for that offence. The Duke (as is said) laying downe weapon, and himselfe proclaiming Queene Marie, was neuertheless arrested with Francis Earle of Huntington in the Kings Colledge at Cambridge by a Sergeant at Armes, but letters being then sent from the Councill, that every man should be dismissed without further trouble, the Duke among them was also released.

(13) The next morning Henrie Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell, came into Cambridge from the Queene, who entering his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell vpon his knees, desiring him for Gods loue to consider his case, that had done nothing without warrant of him, and the Councill; my Lord, said Arundell, I am sent hither from the Queene to arrest you, and I, said the Duke, obey your arrest, yett beleeue your Lordship to vie mercy towards him whose Acts haue bene no more then was enjoined by commission, that sooner should you haue sought for, said the Earle, and thereupon committed him to guard, and left him to the mercy of the Queene.

(14) The Duke then with his three sonnes John, Ambrose and Henrie, the Earle of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, John and Henrie, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sandes were conueied towards London, and brought to the Tower, where the Lord Gifford Dudley, and the Lady Iane his wife, from the high Title of Soueraignty were made subiect to dejected Prisoners miseries.

(15) Queene Marie from Fremingham repaired towards London, being all the way flouted without any mislikes, sauing that many men feared the altering of Religion: at her entrance into the Tower were released Thomas Duke of Norfolk, who had laine there from the last of King Henry the eight, Edward Lord Courtney whom shee forthwith aduanced Earle of Deuonshire, Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, and Stephen Gardiner late Bishop of Winchester, by her then made Lord Chancellor of England, From the Marhal-l was freed Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, and now againe restored by the depoling of Doctor Ridley, who for his Sermon lately made, was committed to the Tower; so likewise Doctor Scorie gaue place vnto Daye, in the Bishopricke of Chichester, Miles Cauerdale into Westes in the Bishopricke of Excester, and John Hooper vnto Heath, in the Bishopricke of Worcester; who forthwith was committed to the Fleet, and Archbishop Crammer, into the Tower; so roughly shee began with the reformed Clergy, (how milde souer her other proceedings were) in whole disgrace, Doctor Bourne Chaplaine to Bonner, made a Sermon at Pauls Crosse which so offended his Hearers, that a Dagger was throwne at him, to his great danger, and such threats muttered by the people, as had not Master Bradford stepped vp in his room, and perliwaded the people vnto quietnesse, surely it had cost the Preacher his life: which caused the Crosse the next Sabbath to bee guarded by the Queenes Guard, whilst the Preacher spake there to the people.

(16) This moued Queene Marie to put forth a Proclamation against those Preachers, and printed bookes; which any wise pointed towards the disgrace of the Papall See, the teinture whereof had stuck in her own breast euersince her infancie; and so much was shee deuoted to that of Rome, as being often moued by King Edward, her brother, to imbrace the Gospell according to Lawes in his time established, with promise of her aduancement, by matching her in Marriage with Don Lewis the brother of Portingall, her answer was, shee had rather to forgoe all earthly preferments, and to loose all her Lands, and other Liuinges, then to change her receiued opinion of her fure belied Religion.

(17) Her entrance thus standing, and State nothing safe (as shee thought) whilst the Duke of Northumberland (a Protestant) and other his Complices (for the most part in durance) were aliue, their arraignment were hastened, and deaths not long after lingred, which they suffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, where the Duke hauing promise of life, if he would recant his profession, Dastard-like with Peter, forooke his master, and exhorted the people to the Romish profession: which his death Sermon afterwards by authority, came forth in Print. With him suffered Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer much more constant as appeared by their speech.

(18) The way (saith Master Foxe) thus made by blood, Queene Marie passed through London vnto Westminster to receive the Crowne, which was solemnly set on her Head by Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, for that both the Archbishops were prisoners in the Tower: when a pardon was also published for many offences, which notwithstanding were so followed by them in Commission, as some were fined, some lost their Fees, some cast into Prison, and some deuiued of all their estates.

(19) The next that felt the calamities of those times, were the Lady Iane and the Lord Gifford Dudley her Husband, both innocent persons in that which their Fathers had done: Shee doubleste was a Lady of admirable gifts both in learning, religion, and humane knowledge, as by her conference with Fecknam, letters to an Apostata, exhortation to her Sister, and prayers by her made in most feeling manner, doe euidently appeare, and that shee was constrained to consent to the things done is manifest by a letter sent to her father a little before her death; wherein, after a holy and dutifull exhortation vnto patience, shee vith this Speech. My deare Father (if I may without offence reioice in mine owne misfortune) me seemes in this I may account my selfe blessed, that washing my hands with the innocencie of my fault, my guiltlesse blood may cry before the Lord, mercie, mercie, to the innocent. And yet though I must acknowledge, that being constrained, and as you wot well enough, continually assailed, in taking upon me, I seemed to consent, and therein offended the Queene and her Lovers: yet doe I assurelye trust that this mine offence towards God is much the lesse, in that being in so viall estate as I was, mine enforced honour neuer agreed with mine innocent heart.

The vertues of Lady Iane. Lawrence Ham-fry.

Lady Iane in her Letter sent to her Father.

(20) Yet must the Law for so great an offence take place, for triall whereof this late titled Queene, and now miserable Lady, was brought into Guildhall in London, where shee with the Lord Guilford, Archbishop Cranmer, and the Lord Ambrose Dudley, were arraigned and condemned. But Cranmer (as Fox saith) was acquit of Treason, and stood onely in the case of Doctrine, which then was accounted Heresie, and so againe were returned to the Tower, for whom great lamentations were made, especially for the good Lady Jane, whose state the Queene herselfe pitied, as that shee had the liberty of the Tower to walke in the Queenes Garden, and on the Hill; and surely had not her Father after his first offence fallen into another, shee had bene (as was thought) pardoned of life.

(21) His second offence was, that whereas Queene Mary had a purpose to marry with the Spaniard, and to that ende embraced the Suite of Philip, the sonne of Charles the Emperour, many a well Nobles as others disliked the Match, fearing not only the change of Religion, wherunto many of them stood very well affected, but even of the Lands servitude vnto strangers, as was likely to happen, both in the Husband and Issue. To prevent which this Henry Duke of Suffolke but lately pardoned of life, secretly departed vnto Leicester and Warwick-shires, making Proclamations for the abandoning of Strangers, and infligated the People to withstand the Queenes marriage agreed vpon with Philip.

(22) These stirres thus abroad, the Earle of Huntingtree was sent into those parts, who taking Countess (which Citie Suffolke thought himselfe sure of) forelaid the Countrey in such wise, as the Duke for his best refuge committed himselfe to the trust and secret keeping of a seruant of his, called Penderwood, remaining in Asheley Parke, who against the trust reposed treacherously betrayed him, and his brother John Lord Grey, vnto the Earle; whence presently by him they were conuaid Prisoners vnto the Tower of London, their other brother Lord Thomas escaping in the dead of the night, was presently apprehended in the borders of Wales, and from thence was brought Prisoner to London.

(23) This (I say) seemed to hasten the death of those innocents, whom their Fathers had doubly brought into danger, for the Statists of those times, knowing their Queene could haue no quiet whilst these great opposts were reared against her, held it best pollicy to take them away, whereupon the twelfth of February and first day of the weeke, Lord Guilford Dudley was had to the Scaffold vpon Tower Hill, and there with prayers and great penance ended his life: whose body all bloody laid in a Cart together with the Head wrapped in a cloth was brought into the Chappell within the Tower, even in the sight of this forsworn Lady, a spectacle more deadly then was the Axe of her death. And now her own part next to be acted, the Stage of her Tragedy was raised vpon the greene, within the Tower, wherein being mounted with a cheerefull countenance, and a patient minde, these words with great constancy she spake at that present.

(24) Good people, I am come to die, and by Law I am condemned to the same, my offence against the Queenes Highnesse was onely in consent to the deuis of others, which now is deemed Treason: yet it was neuer of my seeking, but by counsell of those who should seeme to haue further vnderstanding of things then I, which knew little of the Law, and much lesse of Titles to the Crowne. But touching the procurement and desire thereof by mee, or on my behalfe, I doe wath my hands in innocencie thereof before God, and the face of you all this day: And therewith free wring her hands wherein she had a Booke. I pray you all good Christian people (saide shee) to beare mee witness that I die a true Christian woman, and that I looke to be saued by none other means but onely by the mercy of God, in the blood of his onely sonne Iesus Christ, and I confesse that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the same, and loued my selfe and the world, and therefore this plague and punishment is iustly and worthily happened vpon me for my sinnes, and yet I thanke God of his goodnesse, that hee hath giuen me a time and respite to repent. And now good people while I am aliue, I pray you assist me with your prayers.

(25) Then kneeled shee downe, and said in English the fiftie one Psalm: and againe standing vp, gaue her booke to Master Bridges, then Lieutenant of the Tower: then vntying her Gowne, the executioner offered to helpe, whom she desired to forbear, and so turning to her two Gentlewomen was disrobed of that and her other Attires. This done, the Headman kneeled downe and askt her forgiveness, vnto whom shee said, the Lord forgive thee, and I doe; and I pray thee dispatch mee quickly, and kneeling againe, said will you take it off before I lye downe? hee answered, no Madam. Then shee tied a Handkercher ouer her eyes, and feeling for the blocke laid, where is it, where is it, lastly laying her Necke vpon the same stretched forth her body and said, Lord Iesus into thy hands I commend my spirit; which was scarcely vttered before shee receiued the fatal stroke of the Axe: and thus ended the life of this chaste, innocent, and most vertuous Lady: whose case through the feuerity of the Law adjudged accordingly, yet was her death much lamented of al, but most especially greuous vnto him that gaue the sentence of the same, euen Judge Morgan, who thereupon presently fell madde, and in his rauiings continually cryed, take away the Ladie Jane from me, and in that horror shortly ended his life. I will not aouuch that shee was with childe at the day of her death, though it was so reported, but rather iudge a more Christian-like proceeding against so great a person, though the time (as we well know) proued very bloody.

(26) Eleuen daies after her death, her Father Henry Duke of Suffolke, was executed vpon the Tower hill, euen the twenty three of February where hee most Christianly made profession of his Faith, and with great repentance of his fact receiued the stroke of death; and the three and twenty of April following, his brother the Lord Thomas Grey suffered death in the same place.

(27) That the intended marriage with Philip of Spaine, was the cause of their last insurrection wee haue said; to perfwade which, how eloquently Louer had bene deliuered by Stephen Gardiner, Lord Chancellour, vnto the Nobility in the Chamber of Prefence, setting forth the honour, the riches, and augmentation of Titles to the Crowne, and Kingdom of England: yet was it distastie to moek of their Stomackes, in so much that combinations were made against the process, and many in many places vp in Armes: whereof Sir Thomas Wyatt of Kent, was the first, and that vpon this occasion.

(28) Among many dislikers of the Queenes marriage it chanced, one, for some other offence, to be committed to the Fleet by the Councill, who being an inward acquaintance of Wyates, was supposed by him to haue reueiled the conspiracy; wherupon he put himselfe in action, before the enterprife was altogether ripe, and accompanied with Thomas Isele, and others, at Maidstone in Kent, published a Proclamation against the Queenes marriage, alleading the thraldome whereunto the Land would become subiect, by that Spanish match, and from Maidstone accompanied with Sir George Harper hastened to Rochester, where they forthwith brake downe the Bridge.

(29) In the meane while Sir Henry Isele, Anthony and William Kneut, brethren, in East, and West Kent, perfwaded the people (who were willing y enough) to take part with Wyatt, for at Milton, Christopher Roper, in making Proclamation for the Queene, assisted by Master Tuck and Dorell, both Iustices of Peace, were all three taken and conveyed vnto Rochester, and there retained Prisoners by Sir Thomas Wyatt, wherupon Sir Robert Southwell high Sheriffe of Kent, with the Lord Aburgawney and others, vpon the market day at Malling in a penned Oracion exhorted the hearers from such seditious enterprizes. On the other side Sir Henrie Isele at Tunbridge, proclaimed the said Lord, the Sheriffe and their adherents, Traitors to God and the Crowne. Thus was Kent diuided, and preparations made to maintain the faction, according as the Gentlemen stood diuersly affected.

(30) The Lord of Aburgawney with the Sherif, and others, hearing that Sir Henry Isele, and the two Kneuts, conductors of five hundred Wellmen, meant their March vnto Rochester, to iolue with Wyatagainst the Duke of Norfolke, who was then come to Craneford with five hundred Londoners in the quarrell of the Queene, to intercept that designe early the next morning, they marched with many Kenish yeomen vnto Barrow-greene, a place that lay directly in their passage to Rochester, where ordering their men staied the approach of the Enemy: who seeing themselves thus forelaid, turned secretly aside into another by-way, and gotten vnto Wrotham-hill supposing they had bene quit of all danger, displayed their Ensignes.

(31) The Queenes friends thus defeated, were in a maruellous rage, & hasting forward ouertooke Sir Henry, & the two Kneuts before they could ascend the height of the Hill, where presently began a most hot skirmish, many wounds giuen, & many Prisoners taken, till lastly the seditious were scattered, and fled; Sir Henry Isele into Hampshire, and others into other parts, a few escaping to ioyne with their Confort.

(32) The beginning thus vnfortunate, made many to misdoubt of the end, among whom Sir George Harper got from Wyatt, and submitted himselfe to the Duke of Norfolke, who with Sir Henry Termingham Captaine of the guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fog and others, vpon Monday the twenty seauen of Ianuary, came vnto Stroud neere Rochester, and there being builed in planning of his Ordinance, was certainly told that the Londoners meant to betray him: wherfore hee staid and turning about, he saw Captaine Bret, and the band of white Coates at his backe, crying, we are all Englishmen, we are all Englishmen: which suddaine conspiracy caused the Duke and the Captaine of the Guard, to shift for themselves, and left their vnfaitfull followers, to the dispose of their owne affections vnto Wyatt: among whom Sir George Harper lately receiued of the Duke, lightly turned againe vnto Wyatt. This Duke (saith Grafton) being an aged man, and fortunate before in all his warres, vpon this distastie impressed such dolour of mind, that for verie griefe thereof he liued not long after.

(33) Wyatt, and his associates greatly encouraged by this new supply, with eight brasse Peeeces taken of the Queenes, besides other of their owne, marched the next morning vnto Cowling Cattle, where the Lord Cobham then lay, and bending these Ordinance against the Gate, brake it open with their shot, and made entrance for their men. The Lord Cobham right valiantly resisted their doings, and bestowed freely such small munition as he had, against their breasts, euen with his owne hands: in which enterprize two of his men were slaine, and Wyatt after some talke had with the said Lord departed vnto Craneford, where hee with his men were lodged that night.

(34) The next day hee came vnto Dartford, whither reformed Sir Edward Hastings Master of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis Knights, both of them being priuie Counsellors to the Queene. Their coming signified, Sir Thomas Wyatt with certaine Gentlemen went forth to meet them; Wyatt somewhat marching before the rest with a partizan in his hand, at whose approach Sir Edward Hastings alighted, and spake vnto him as followeth:

(35) The Queenes Maiesty requireth to vnderstand the true cause, wherefore you haue gathered in Armes her liege people against her, which is the part of a Traitor, and yet in your Proclamation you call your selfe a true Subject, both which cannot stand together. I am no Traitor, quoth Wyatt, and the cause why I haue assembled the people, is to defend the Realme from danger of being overrunne by Strangers, which must needs follow, if the marriage take place. Why said the Counsellors, there is no stranger yet come, either for power or number whom you need to suspect; therefore if that thing onely be the quarrell, will you that dislike the marriage, come to communication touching the cause, and the Queene is content you shall be heard. To that I yeild said Sir Thomas Wyatt; but for my further surety, I will rather bee trusted then truist, and thereupon demanded (as some haue written faith Holinshed) the Custody of the Tower and her Grace within it, as also the displacing of some Counsellors about her, and to place other in their Rooms: To which the Master of the Horse replied: Wyatt, be fore thou shalt haue thy traitorous demand granted, thou shalt die and twenty thousand with thee, and so these Agents departed to the Court, and Wyatt forthwith came vnto Deeford by Greene-wich.

(36) At whose approach to these London, such feares were possessed, that besides those in the Court (who instigated the Queene to remove into the Tower) the Lord Maior, Aldermen, and most of the Citizens were in Armour, and the Sergeants and Lawyers at Westminster Hall pleaded their causes in Harnesse, at which time it was no need to bid the Spanish Ambassadors be gone, who no more standing to woo for their matter, made away by water as fast as they could: and yet some comfort was conceiued by the certaine newes of the discomfiture of the Carrews and Gibs, that were making head in the West wholly defeated, and fled: which was proclaimed in London vpon Candlemas Eue: vpon the day of that feast Queene Mary to make the City sure on her side, came vnto the Guild-Hall, accompanied with many Courtiers, whither likewise were assembled the Lord Maior, the Aldermen, and the chiefe Citizens in their Liureries: the Queene being placed and all men attending her pleasure, with verigood grace, and words well vttered, shee spake in effect as heere in-sueeth.

(38) In my owne person I am come vnto you to tell you that, which your selues already doe see and know, I mean the traitorous and seditious number of the Kentish Rebels, that are assembled against vs and you. Their pretence (as they say) is to resist a marriage betwene vs and the Prince of Spaine, of all their plots, pretended quarrells, and euill contriued Articles, you haue bene made priuie. Since which time, our Councill haue reformed to the Rebels, demanding the cause of their continued enterprize, by whose answers the marriage is found to bee the least of their quarrell: or rather a cloake to couer their pretended purposes against our Religion; for, (swearing from their former Articles, they now manifestly bewray the inward Treason of their hearts, most arrogantly de-

"manding the possession of our person, the keeping of our Tower, and not onely the placing and displacing of our Counsellors: but also to vse them as vs at their pleasures: what I am louing Subjects, you right well know, your Queene, to whom at my Coronation, when I was wedded to the Realme, and to the Lawes of the same (the spouall ring whereof I haue on my finger, which neuer hitherto was, nor hereafter shall be left off) ye promised your allegiance, and obedience vnto mee. And that I am the right, and true inheritor to the English Crowne, I not onely take all Christendome to witness, but also your Acts of parliaments confirming the same. My Father (as you all know) possessed the regall estate by right of inheritance, which now by the same right is descended vnto mee: to him you alwaies shewed your felicitie both faithfull and louing Subjects, as to your liege Lord and King, and therefore I doubt not but you will shew your felicitie to me his daughter; which if you doe, then may you not suffer any rebell to stirre the Government of our Person, or interpose our estate, especially so presumptuous a traitor as this Wyat hath shewed himselfe to be: who most certainly, as he hath abused our ignorant Subjects, to be adherents to his traitorous quarrell, so doth he intend by the colour of the same, to subdue the lawes to his will, and to giue scope to the rascall and fowlorne persons, to make generall hauocke and spoile of your goods. And this I say further vnto you in the word of a Prince, I cannot tell how naturally a mother loveth her children, for I was neuer the mother of any; but certainly if a Prince and Gouverneur may as naturally loue the Subjects, as the mother doth her child, then assure your felicitie that I being your Soueraigne, Lady, and Queene, doe as earnestly and tenderly loue and fauour you. And I thus louing you, cannot but think, that you as heartily & faithfully loue me again: & so this loue boide together in the knot of concord, wee shall be able I doubt not, to giue these rebels a short and speedy ouerthrow. Now as concerning my intended marriage, you shall vnderstand that I entred not into the treaty thereof, without the aduice of our pruy Councell, yea and by assent of those, to whom my father committed his trust, who haue so considered the great commodities that may thereof ensue, as they not onely haue thought it very honorable, but also expedient, both for the Wealth of our Realme, and also of our louing Subjects. But as touching my selfe (I assure you) I am not so desirous of wedding, neither am I so precisely wedded to my will, that either for mine owne pleasure I will chooseth where I lust, or els so amorous, as needs I must haue one: for I thanke God (to whom be the praise) I haue hitherto liued a Virgine, and doubt not but with Gods grace to bee able to liue so still. But if (as my Progenitors haue done before) it might please God that I might leaue some fruit of my body to be your Gouverneur, I trust you would not onely reioyce thereat, but also I know it would be to your great comfort: and certainly if I either did know or thinke, that this marriage should either turne to the danger or losse of any of you my louing Subjects, or to the detriment of any part of the roiall Estate of this English Realme, I would neuer consent therunto, neither would I euer marry whilst I liued. And in the word of a Queene, I promise and assure you, that if it shall not probable appeare before the Nobility and Commons in the high Court of Parliament, that this marriage shalbe for the singular benefit and commoditie of the whole Realme, that then I will abstaine not onely from this marriage, but also from any other. Wherefore good Subjects plucke vp your hearts, and like true men stand fast with your lawfull Prince against these Rebels, both ours and yours, and feare them not, for (I assure you) I

"doe not: and will leaue with you my Lord Howard, and my Lord Treasure to bee Assistant with my Lord Maior for the safeguard of the City from spoile & lackage, which is the only scope of this rebellious Company.

(37) The Oration ended, and the Citizens well pleased, Queene Marie with good content returned to the Court, where conferring with her Councell, shee ordained the Lord William Herbert Earle of Pembroke generall of the Field, and gave forth by Proclamation, that whosoever could bring Wyat either quicke or dead, should be rewarded with an hundred pound Lands by yeere, to him and his posterity for euer.

(38) Wyat in Defford, and knowing what was done, with fouretene Ensignes, and foure thousand strong, vpon Saturday the third of February marched towards London, at whose approach, the white Tower hauing him in daiger shot off her Ordinance, but did misse their marke, some leuellling too farre ouer, and some as much too short. His entrance into Southwarke was peaceable and without all resistance, though many Country men were therein bestowed to withstand his coming, who contrary to trust, ioyed with the Kentish, and then to winne the hearts of the people, he presently made Proclamation that no Souldier should take away anie thing without due payment, and the parties consent: notwithstanding Winchester house foone felt the contrarie, whose goods were ransacked, the Bookes in the Librarie cut and defaced, and not a lock left vpon the doores: such spoiles insurrections euer ayme at, how faire fouer they foyle the glasse to the sight.

(39) The Suburbs thus his, he assured himselfe the City likewise shortly would be, but coming to the Bridge, he found the Gates fast shut, neither in haft to open them for him, therefore making a trench at the Bridge-foote, planted two peeces of Ordinance against the Gate: At Saint Georges Church he mounted another, the fourth at the entrance into Barmondsey streete, and the fift towards the Bishop of Winchesters house.

(40) Within the City the Lord Maior, and Lord William Howard, caused the draw bridge to bee cut downe, and making fortifications for their defence, placed great Ordinance against the entrance. Wyat still thirsting to know the Cities intent, got with some few followers through the Porters lodge vnto the draw bridge, where being vncene himselfe, saw the passage too difficult to haue friendly access, and thereupon said to his conforters, this place is too hot for vs. Besides the Tower began to be topped with Ordinance, seauen Culuerings and Demie Cannons, leuelled against the Bridgefoote, the Steeles of Saint Olives, and Saint Mary Querles, all the White Tower laden with her peeces, three fauonets ouer the water-Gate, and a double Culuering vpon Diuelling Tower: and all these were turned and fearfully charged vpon the Borough of Southwarke, which seene, the Inhabitants with great lamentations came vnto Wyat, and complained, that for his cause they were like to be vterly ydone, who stricken with pittie and remorse of so many, presently remoued his Armitowards Kingston vpon Thames, where finding the Bridge broken downe, with Ladders and Planks he soone repaired it, and so passing the riuer the same night, came to Braineford before hee was descried by the Queenes Scouts, the newes whereof sore troubled the Court. Wyats hopes were to haue surprized the Cite vpon the suddaine, and therefore made such hast as he did, but being hindred by a Peeces of great Ordinance that was dismounted from the carriage, came not vnto Knights bridge before it was day.

(41) In the same morning the Earle of Pembroke Lord General had taken Saint James Fields, whither Wyat and his in good order marched, but seeing the way foreclosed both with foote and horsemen, turned downe

downe the old lane directly towards Saint James, whence Captaine Faughan with two Ensignes tooke towards Westminster, and Wyat along the causey leading to Charing-Crosse, the Lord Generall Horsem, hitherto stood howering aloofe, vntill the enemy was passed, all but the taile, vpon which they violently set, and feuered from thence, the maine neuer looking backe to releue their distresse.

(42) From the higher ground, and along the highway the great Ordinance plaied, and Wyats againe answered the like, though with small hurt to either, onely one from the Hill slew three of Wyats men in a rancke, and stracke through the Brickewall into the Parke. Wyat passing forward by the battell of footmen without any impeachment, came to Charing-Crosse, where the Lord Chamberlaine and Sir John Gage, stood ready to resist him: but Kentish Souldiers rushing violently into the streets, forced them into the gates of White-hall which presently were shut, and a report in the Court that the Lord General was reuolted to Wyat, all so distracted that none durst trust others, and no other voice therein heard, but Treason, Treason. Meane while Wyat with such small company as hee had, hastid through Fleetstreet, and came vnto Ludgate, where hee knocked to haue entrance, and well hoped of further assistance, but was farre deceiued, the gate being guarded against him, with a number of true Citizens and bands of the Queenes friends.

(43) But those straglers that had taken into Westminster, whereof Kneut was Captaine, seeking to recouer their companions, came before the Court gates, and there made their stand, which being shutte against them shot many of their arrowes into the Garden, yea and into the windowes of White-hall, though without any hurt: from the Court thus guarded against them, they forthwith departed, meaning to follow Wyat their Leader into London, and marching forward, were met with at Charing-Crosse, by Sir Henry Termingham, Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordinance, and Sir Philip Paris Knights, sent thither by order of the Lord General, with a band of Archers, and certaine Field peeces to secure the Court, their Artillery discharged, they presently ioint fight with the Rebels at pulse of the Pike, who a while stucke to it manfully; in which conflict was the triall of the day: but as their quarrell was traitorous, so their hearts were soone quelled, each one sauing himselfe by flight, wherein about twenty of those bemoired Souldiers were slaine, and no other crie heard, but downe with the Daggletailes.

(44) Wyat returned from Ludgate, late downe vpon a fall against the common Inne called Bell-savage, where hee beganne (as it should seeme) to expostulate what his heady rashnesse had done, and the vaine hopes hee had conceiued of the Citizens abatement, who seldome tooke part against the Crowne: he then despairing of further successe, retired backe towards the Court, and was not staied vntill hee came to Temple-Barre, where certaine Horsemen coming from the field, met him full in the face, betwixt whom began some bickering, till lastly Clarentius King at Armes came to him and said; Master Wyat you see the day is gone against you; and in resisting you can doe no good, but hazard the death of your Souldiers, and your selfe, to the great perill of your soule. My counsell is, that you were best to yeelde, and perchance you may finde the Queene mercifull, if you stay from further bloodshed.

(45) Wyat heereat somewhat astoned, seeing now his whole designes defeated (though his few Souldiers were bent still to fight) answered the Herald, Well then, If I must needs yeeld, I will yeeld to a Gentleman: to whom Sir Maurice Barkley came presently and bad him mount his Horse behinde, in like manner another tooke vp Sir Thomas Cobham, and the third Thomas Kneut, and so carried them

vnto the Court, whence in the afternoone, they with the two Amels, and Alexander Bret, were committed to the Tower, Sir Thomas Wyat wearing a shirt of Male vnder a velvet Caslocke, and the wind-lace of his Dagge hanging about his necke. The next day eleuen Gentlemen more of name and account, were likewise committed to the Tower. In London about fifty persons were hanged for Wyats conspiracie, and foure hundred more led through the Cite with halters about their neckes to Westminster, where in the Tilt-yard they were all pardoned by the Queene, pronouncing her mercy from the Gallerie above.

(46) But the Capitall offender Sir Thomas Wyat arraigned at Westminster vpon case of high Treason, confessed the inditement and had iudgement of death accordingly, which he suffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill the eleuenth of April following; his words to the people were these, "Good people I am come hither presently to die, being thereunto lawfully and worthily condemned, for I haue fore offended against God and the Queenes Maies: "Ay; I trust God hath forgiven mee, and will take mercy vpon me; I beseech the Queenes maiesy alfo of forgiveness (hee hath forgiven you quoth Doctor Weston) let euerie man beware how hee taketh any thing in hand against the higher powers; vnlesse God be propserable to his purpose, it will neuer take good effect or successe, whereof you may now learne by me, and I pray God I may be the last example in this place. But where it is said and noised abroad, that I should accuse the Lady Elizabeth and the Lord Courtney, it is not so, good people: For I assure you, neither they, nor any other now yonder in hold was priue to my rising before I began, as I haue declared no lesse to the Queenes Councell, and that is most true. Then said Doctor Weston, marke heere my masters, he saith that, that which he hath shewed to the Councell in writing of them, is most true. Whereupon Wyat put off his Gowne, his dublet, and waistcoat, and knitting a kercheise ouer his eies with most feruent prayers, received the stroke of the Axe.

(47) Alexander Bret, and twenty two Kentish persons besides, were executed in diuers parts of that County: others were likewise arraigned for the same Conspiracy, as Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Sir James Croft, the one quibed by his Inquest, the other pardoned of life by the Queene. Many others were suspected as aiders vnto Wyat, and his enterprise, among whom the Lord Courtney, and the Princess Elizabeth, sister to the Queene, were not the least, and therefore both of them committed to the Tower: of which Ladies troubles, innocency, and truth, thus we find related.

(48) These Virgine Princes were not so neerely linked in blood and nature, as they were separated asunder in affecting Religion, and that being the prime cause for which these commorions were raised, Queene Mary much suspected her sister to bee a principall mouer therein. The ielousie whereof, Gardiner of Winchester did further inflame, by blowing Coniectures into her eare: so that needs the Princess must be sent for, then lying sicke at her Mannour of Ashbridge, euen the next day after that Wyat rold. The messengers were, Sir John Williams, Sir Edward Hastings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, all three Priue Counsellors, with a troope of Horsemen in number two hundred and fifty.

(49) These coming to Ashbridge at tenne in the night, suddenly ascended into her Priue Chamber, and making it knowne they came from the Queene, had present access to her Bed-Chamber; where the said Lady lay very sore sicke: their first salutations were, that they were sorry to see her in that estate, and I am not glad fide, to see you here at this time of the night; Madame, quoth they, our Message requires haste, and the Queenes pleasure is, that you shall bee at London the seuenth of this month

The conference of the 3. Counsellors with Lady Elizabeth.

neth. No Creature gladder to come to her Maiefty then I (said Lady Elizabeth) being right sorry that I am not in case at this time to attend her Grace, as your felues here see. Indeed (said they) for that we see, we are heartily sorry, but our commission is, that we bring you to London either quicke or dead, whereat the being greatly amazed, sorrowfully said, she wel hoped their commissiō was nothing so strait, but they calling for two Doctors of Physicke demanded whether shee might be removed with life, and that being resolved, bad her prepare against the next morning, and so left this innocent Princeesse very sore perplexed the rest of the night.

Lady Elizabeth
as a prisoner conducted to the Court.

Princes Elizbeth examined
of treason.

(50) The next morning approached, and shee in no better plight, notwithstanding was led forth more like a Prisoner then a Prince, which the people in every place as she passed, did much lament, and strongly guarded, was so conducted vnto the Court, where for foureteene daies space, shee comfortlesse continued without sight of friend, the Queene or any Lords, those onely excepted that attended the doers, which were the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir John Gage.

(51) Vpon Friday before Palme Sunday, Gardiner of Winchester, and nine more of the Councell, came into her presence, and there charged her both with Wyatts Conspiracy, and the stirres lately made in the West parts by Sir Peter Carew and others, which shee most constantly denied: but in conclusion they told her it was the Queenes pleasure, that shee should forthwith goe to the Tower, the name of which dolefull prison stricke deepe to her heart. I trust (said shee) her Maiefty will be farre more gracious then to commit to that place a true and most innocent woman, that neuer had offended her in thought, word nor deed. And thereupon instantly desired those Lords to bee a meane for her vnto the Queene: which some of them promised, and much pittied her case. But about an howre after, came foure of these Lords againe, namely, Winchester, the Treasurer, the Steward and Suffex: with a charge to discharge her of all attendants, sauing onely her Gentleman Vther, three Gentlewomen, and two Groomes of her Chamber, the Guard was set to warde in the next rooms; two Lords with bands of men to watch in the Hall, and two hundred Northern white Coates in the Garden, thus all was made sure, and shee kept from starting.

The honourable parts of the Earle of Suffex.

(52) The next day came vnto her two Lords of the Councell with commendement from the Queen to haue her to the Tower; they roundly told her, her Barge was prepared, and that the tide would carry for no body: this heauy newes encreased this distressed Ladies pensiuensse, who in most humble wise became Petitioner vnto their Lordships, that shee might stay vntill the next tide, which as she wel hoped, would proue more comfortable; but the one of them being more forward in his Commission then the other, flatly told her that neither tide nor time should bee delaied. Whereupon her Grace desired shee might write to the Queene: he againe answered, that hee durst not suffer it, neither in his iudgement was it convenient: but the other more mild (which was the Earle of Suffex) kneeling down told her that her Grace should haue liberty to write her mind: swearing as hee was a true man, himselfe would deliuer it into the Queenes hand, and bring her the answer, whatsoeuer came of it: which honourable permission was then most thankfully taken, and afterward most highly esteemed in her Princely fauours towards that honourable man; but in writing this letter or petition to the Queene, the Tide was turned, and serued not to shoote the bridge with a Barge, therefore it was pruiely determined to take the advantage of the next, which with better aduiselement was againe deferred, for that it fell about midnight, whence rose a feare that she might bee forceably taken from them before shee came to the Tower: and so with great prouidence was that danger prevented.

(53) The next day being Palme Sunday, serued well for their purpose, when as vnder pretext of deuotion, the Citizens of London were commanded to carry their Palmes to the Church, whilst her Barge might be passed by without light or any suspect. And to that purpose the forelaide two Noble men about nine of the Clocke repaired vnto her, shewing that the time was now come, that her Grace must goe to the Tower; to which shee answered, the Lords will be done, I am contented: seeing it is the Queenes mind: and coming into the Garden to take Barge, shee cast her eyes towards euery Window, hoping to see some that would pity her case, but that also failing, shee sighed and said, I maruell what the Nobility meane to suffer me a Prince to be led into Captiuitie, the Lord knowes whither, for my selfe doe not.

Lady Elizabeth
carried priuily
vnto the Tower.

(54) Great haste was made to the barge, and as much to get by London viueine: but the tyde yong and not fully come in, the fall of the water at the Bridge was so great, as the Barge men themselves feared to passe thereunder, and motioned a stay till the streame were more leuell, which in no wise would bee heard: whereupon they passed the Arch with such danger, as the keene of the boate stricke against the ground, and come to the staires, could not take land without stepping into the water, which this tender, and newly recovered Princeesse was forced to doe, in which passage shee vttered these words: I speake before thee O God, hauing none other friend but thee onely; here I landeth as true a subiect, being prisoner, as ever landed at these staires; to which the seuerall Lords answered, if it were so, it was the better for her. Shee came into the gate, a great number of Seruants and Warders of the Tower stood to guard her, through whom as shee passed, the poore men kneeling downe with one voice, desired God to preserve her Grace, whereof some were rebuked, and others put from their Ordinarie the next day.

hard dealing against the Princess Elizabeth.

The constan-tience of Lady Elizabeth.

(55) Then passing somewhat further both faint and vncomfortable, shee rested her selfe vpon a cold stone, to whom M. Bridges the Lieutenant then being said: Madam, you were best to come out of the raine, for you sit vnwholesomely; to whom shee replied, better sitte here then in a worle place, for God knoweth, and not I, whither you will bring me: at which her sorrowfull and dejected answer, her Gentleman Vther, a seruant most loyall and loving to his Mistresse, among many others brake forth into floods of teares, the witnesses commonly of al inward grife, which the Princes perceiving, reproved, demanding what hee meant so to discourage her, seeing sheeooke him to bee her Comforter, & especially knowing her truth to be such, as that no man should haue any cause to weepe for her.

(56) Shee sate like belowed, and the doers made fast with lockes and bolts, was there comfortlesse left in the dolefull prison, where calling for her booke and her few seruants about her, shee fell vnto prayers, desiring God to prosper her worke, that the might build vpon the rocke Christ: whereby these blustering tempests thus sodainely risen might not preuaile against her foundation. Meane while the Lords were as circumspect, how shee might be kept sure; many among them propounded, that it was most needfull shee should bee close prisoner, and a strong guard set to watch her doers; against which the Lord Suffex replied and said: My Lords let vs take heed we goe not beyond our Commission, shee was our Kings Daughter and we know the Prince next in blood, therefore let vs so deale with her now, that if it so happen, we may answer our doings vnto her another day.

The Earle of Suffex most first for Lady Elizabeth.

(57) Two dayes spent thus in the Tower, and Gods diuine seruice celebrated in English, it was commanded to haue Masse in her lodgings; and to that end two of her yeomen were appointed to answer the Priest, which was as vnwillingly done, as the

the deuotion was small. Then were the fauourites examined, yea and some of them with torture, & all to finde a fitt knife to cut her innocent throte, that so Winchester might wash his white Rochet in her purple blood; who being Lord Chancellor and Ruler of the rest, came into the Tower to examine her himselfe, with some others of the Queenes Councell: Shee then brought before them, was demanded of the talke shee had with Sir James Croft (a prisoner in the Tower, and then brought to her presence) concerning her removing from Albridge vnto Dunnington Castell: My Lords (said shee) mee thinkes you doe mee wrong to examine euery mean Prisoner against me, if they haue done euill let them answer for it, I pray you ioyne mee not with such offenders; as touching my remove to Dunnington, mine officers, and you Sir James Croft can tell; but what is this to the purpose, might I not, my Lords, goe to mine owne houses at all times? whereunto the Lord of Arundell kneeling downe, answered that her Grace said truth, and that himselfe was sorry to see her troubled about such vaine matters: well my Lords (said shee) you sit mee narrowly, but you can doe no more then God hath appointed, vnto whom I pray to forgive you all.

Lady Elizabeth
was examined
of Treason.

Liberty obtained
shee walke in the Garden.

(58) No fault appearing, nor offence found, yet was shee still retained in that close and sorrowfull prison, and for want of fresh aire, her health beganne to bee empaired, whereupon the Lord Shandoy one of her Keepers, obtained that shee might walke into the Queenes lodgings, the windowes being shut onely in presence of himselfe, the Lord Chamberlaine, and three of the Queenes Gentlewomen sent her for the same purpose; which fauour was further increased by libertie to walke into the Garden, the other prisoners commanded not so much as to looke into the place while her Grace remained therein.

(59) During which time there vually repaired vnto her a little boy, about foure yeeres of age (a mansonne of the Tower) in whose pretty prattling sheeooke great pleasure; his vie was to bring her flowers, and to receiue at her hands such thinges as commonly please Children: which lastly brought a great suspition into the Lord Chamberlaines working head, that by this Child letters were brought betwixt the Princess Elizabeth, and the L. Courney, whereupon the boy was threatened, and his father commanded not to suffer him any more to retort to her Grace: which notwithstanding, the next day hee did, but the doer being shut, and hee peeping through a hole, cried vnto her, Mistresse I can bring you no more flowers now.

(60) It was reported (saith Fox) if the relation be true, that a Write subscribed vnder certaine Councillors hands, was directed for the present death of the Lady Elizabeth, which hee doth wholly impute vnto Winchester working: This sodaine charge giuen for her present execution, sore grieved M. Bridges then Lieutenant of the Tower, who forthwith repaired vnto the Queene, to know her further pleasure therein: but shee being altogether ignorant of any such warrant, blamed the doers and gaue a contrary command, whereby was preserved the life of her sister: which howsoeuer (to the disfature of her enemies) it was prolonged, yet her State of liues security seemed little better, and her feares presently conceived, were nothing the lesse: for the Constable discharged, Sir Henry Benisfield a more feruor taylor was placed in his room, who with an hundred Souldiers in blew coates entred vpon his charge: at sight whereof the fearefull Princes demanded, whether the Scaffold whereon Lady Jane suffered was still standing; or whether Sir Henry (a man to her altogether vnknowne) made any conscience of murther, if hers was committed vnto his charge.

(61) The nineteenth of May her Grace was removed from the Tower towards Woodstocke, Sir

Henry Benisfield being her conductor, vnto whom Sir John Williams Lord Tame was ioined in Commission. The first night shee was brought vnto Richmond, where all her owne seruants were removed from her presence, and the rascall Souldiers set to attend her person; by which feuerie beginnings shee much doubted that her dayes were nere spent, and in that place her life must take end: whereupon calling together her seruants desired them to pray for her, for this night (said shee) I thinke I must die, which lamentable wordes drew fountaines of teares out of their eyes; and thereupon her Gentleman Vther went downe vnto the Lord Tame in the Court, desiring him vnfaignedly to shew, whether his Lady and Mistresse that night were in danger of death, whereby himselfe and fellows might take such part as God would appoint. Mary God forbid quoth the Lord Tame, that any such wickednesse should bee intended, which rather then it should bee wrought, I and my men will die at her foot.

The great feares
of Lady Elizabeth

(62) With no greater comfort proceeded the towards Woodstocke: Sir Henry her Taylor (as she termed him) neuer carrying so hard an hand in his Commission; for the people that with teares pressed to meet her in the passage, and with prayers saluted her in most louing manner, hee both threatened, & draue backe, calling them Traitors and Rebels against the Queene and her Lawes, and whereas in certaine villages bells were rung as shee passed for ioy as they conceived it of her deliuerance, Sir Henry Benisfield tooke the matter to distastfull, that hee commanded the bells to surceale, and set the fingers thereof in the stocks; so that not without cause this louing Lady sent this word vnto her poore seruants, and well wishing friends, Tangam ouis, as a sheepe to the slaughter, so am I lead: And surely had not the L. Tame bin more comfortable in his place vnto this distressed Princeesse, her spirite of hopes had been spent before the conduction of her person had bene accomplished.

The ioy that the people conceiued of Lady Elizabeths deliuerance.

(63) Neither in Woodstocke was her liberty much enlarged, nor feares any lesse, shee being inclosed in none of the best lodgings, garded with Souldiers both day and night, and although shee had leaue into some Gardens, yet were fup or fixe lockes betwixt her walke and her lodgings, and all made fast after her entrance. It was also suspected that the Keeper of Woodstocke a notorious Ruffian was infligated to kill this innocent Princes, as also that one Bassett a Darling of Bishoppe Gardiners came to Bladenbridge a mile from Woodstocke, accompanied with twentie men in priuy Coates, earnestly desiring to speake with Lady Elizabeth, pretending secret and importunate business: but Sir Henry her Keeper gone to the Court had giuen strait charge to his brother, that none should haue access vnto her before his returne, though they came from the Councell or Queene her selfe. Whereby that designe was happily lost. What his errand was I will not determine, but others haue conceived it was for no good.

Lady Elizabeth
in danger to be murdered.

(64) Another accident also hapned, whether of purpose, or otherwise I cannot say, but surely it was to the danger of her life: for on the sodain her lodgings were on fire, which beganne to kindle betwixt the boordes and feeling under the Chamber where shee lay, and was vehemently mistrusted to be purposely done. Those and the like feares daily happening, drew the distressed Princes into many passions, whereof one is reported, that shee sitting solitarily at her Prison-window, chanced to see a Maide of Woodstocke in the Parke milking of Kine, and as shee fate, merily to sing ouer her Pale, which stricke this sad pensiuie Prisoner into a deepe meditation, preferring the Maides fortunes farre about her owne, and heartily wished that her selfe were a Milke-maid, into which distresse was her princely birth brought, in which comfortlesse thraldome, wee will a while leaue her, & return to speak of matters in the Court.

A.D. 1553. (65) Queene Mary being now chiefe Pilot her selfe, and set at the helme of all Soueraign power, steered the sterne of her zealous affections, according to her owne liking; when presently vpon her Coronation beganne a Parliament at Westminster, & a Conuocation in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls in London, where shee commanded a free disputation for Religion, without any danger of offence. The Questions to bee controuersed, were concerning a Catechisme set forth in King Edwards dayes, and the presence of Christ in the Sacrament of his Supper. For Popish Transubstantiation stood Disputers Doctor Moreman, Doctor Watson, Doctor Chedsey, Maister Harpsfield, and Maister Morgan, D. Weston Dean of Westminster appointed for Prolocutor: For Christs spiritual presence were M. Haddon, M. Elmar, M. Cheney, M. Philpot, and Maister Perne, these meeting 6 seuerall daies disputed only vpon the last question: but with such disagreement, as lastly Q. Mary commanded Boner to dissolue the assembly, without any Subscriptions to the assertions premised.

Decemb. 13. (66) And not long after Thomas Cranmer Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley Bishoppe of London, and Hugh Latimer sometimes Bishoppe of Worcester, were sent from the Tower of London vnto Oxford, to dispute vpon the saide Argument against Doctor Tresham, Doctor Cole, Doctor, Oglethorpe Doctor Pie, Maister Harpsfield, and Maister Fechnam, all Oxford men, vnto whom from Cambridge were ioyned Doctor Tange, Doctor Glinne, Doctor Seton, Doctor Walton, Doctor Sedgewicke, and Doctor Atkinson, Doctor Weston again being Prolocutor: the disputation beganne vpon the sixteenth of April, and ended the twentieth of the same moneth, with the sentence of those three Bishoppes deaths, which through fire gaue testimony of their faithes, a yeece and sixe moneths after in the Towne Ditch of Oxford: whose disputations, letters, and last endes, are largely set down by M. John Fox in his Acts and Monuments of the Church, vnto whom I refer the desirous Reader, left by enlarging of this, the course of our temporall Story should bee ouermuch interrupted with matters Ecclesiasticall of those sorrowfull times.

A.D. 1554. (67) Queene Mary intending her marriage with Spaine, great feares were conceived that many calamities would follow, aswell to the Church, reformed from abuses, as for the policke proceedings of the Kingdomes affaires; which as some tooke was prognosticated euen from heauen it selfe, by a Raine-bow reuered, the bow turned downward, & the two ends standing upward, as also by two Suns shining at one time, and a good distance asunder in the Skies, both which sights appeared in London the fifteenth of February.

They are burned.

An Act in the 2. of Queene Mary, cap. 2.

In her letters. sent them signed with her hand.

(68) In which City a Parliament to that purpose was assembled, wherein by Statute the marriage was confirmed, though with no lesse liking of those times obseruers, then was the marriage desired which is fained of the Sunne: to hinder whose purpose, the world is said to haue made suite vnto Iupiter, lest hauing more Sunnes then one, the whole frame of the Globe should bee set on fire. These distastfull stomackes Queene Mary well perceived, therefore to giue them content, shee wrote her letters into the West, and to Wales, charging the Lord President, the Bishoppes of Oxford and Salisbury, to intimate the benefite thereof to the whole land, as much as might bee; neither was London forgotten, whose Lord Maior and Commons were sent for to the Court, and there by the Lord Chancellor tolde how by this match all the Realm would bee enriched, but especially London by their trade and trafficke with Spaine.

(69) Vnto Spaine were sent the Earle of Bedford, and the L. Fitzwaters to conduct K. Philip into England; the Lord Admirall with twenty eight shippes securing the seas the space of three moneths before:

all things thus ordered, and Philip in a readines took Barke at Corone in Galicia, and with a Naue of an hundred and fifty saile directed his course for his Queene.

(70) Vpon Friday the twentieth of Iuly, hee arrived at Southampton, and was the first man of that Fleet that set foot on the shore, which no sooner don, but he drew his Sword, and so bare it naked in his hand as hee went. The Earle of Arundell L. Steward of the Queenes house, presented to his Highnesse the George and Garter; and the Maior of Southampton the Keyes of the Towne: thither was sent the Lord Chancellor from the Queene, and hee againe sent of his Nobles vnto her, who was on the way vnto Winchester, to welcome him her selfe: towards which City vpon Monday following, hee set forth, being accompanied with the Marquesse of Winchester, the Earles of Arundell, Darby, Worcester, Bedford, Rutland, Pembroke, and Surrey, the Lordes Clinton, Cobham, Willoughby, Darcy, Attreueres, Talbot, Strange, Fitzwarren, and Norih: besides many Knights and gallant Gentlemen. His Spanish train were the Dukes of Alua, and Medina caliz, the Admirall of Castilla, the Marquesses of Berques, Pisara, Soria, Walli, Aguillar, the Earles of Egmond, Horne, Feria, Chinchon, Oluarez, Saldana, Medica, Euenesalida, Landriano, Castellar, the Bishoppe of Cuenca, and others: so that more honourable attendants had feldome bene seene.

(71) And surely the Couenants were as honourable for England that were agreeed vpon betwixt them, which were branched into tenne Propositions.

1 First was, that Philip should bee stiled King of England during the Matrimony, and should assist his Queene in gouernement, but not dispose of any Lands, Offices, Benefices, or Reuenues in the Realme.

2 That Mary by vertue of this marriage, should bee admitted Queene of the Realmes and Dominions of Spaine already possessed, as of all others, that were appropriated vnto the same, during the Matrimony.

3 That for Dowry shee should receiue yeerely three score thousand pound Flemish, if in case the ouerlived King Philip her husband.

4 That the Issue proceeding of this marriage either male or female in the right of their mothers inheritance, in the Kingdomes either of England, or other Dominions depending, should succeed in them according to the lawes, statutes, and customes of the same.

5 That if it chanced Charles Duke of Austria, the Infant of Spaine to die without Issue, then the eldest sonne of this Matrimony should succeed in all the Dukedomes, Earledomes, Dominions and Patrimonial lands, belonging vnto Charles the Emperour, father to the Prince of Spaine, aswell in Burgoyne as in the low Countries, in the Dukedomes of Brabant, Luxembourg, Gelderland, Zutphane, Friesland, in the Countries of Flanders, Artois, Holland, Zeland, Namure, and the land beyond the Iles.

6 That the Dominions of the low Country, and of Burgundy should bee excluded from the Patrimonial descent of the said Lord Charles, notwithstanding his issue remained, and should bee enioyed by the eldest borne of this marriage without further claime to any other Dominions belonging vnto Spaine: and the rest of the Children thereof proceeding to haue convenient portions and Dowry assigned them aswell out of those Countries; as out of England and the others adioined.

7 That if no issue male were borne of this marriage then the Eldest female should possesse those Dominions, provided that shee should marry a nobleman, either of the low Country or of the Realm of England, otherwise the right of the Succession should remaine in the Lord Charles, yet not so cut off, but that that he with the other daughters begot in this marriage should be endowed of their fathers Lands and possessions, aswell in Spaine as in the low Countries.

8 That for want of Issue by the Lord Charles, and of heire male procreated by this Marriage in that case the Eldest daughter of K. Philip and Q. Mary should succeed both, in the Territories of the low Countries, as also in the Realmes of England, Spaine, and the rest, after the nature, lawes and customes of the same.

9 That who so succeeded, either he or shee, yet should the feuerall Dominions be gouerned by the Natiues borne in the Realmes, wholly and intirely after the priuiledges, rites and accustomed manner formerly vsed.

10 That a sincere fraternity, vnitie and peace; should be confirmed for euer betwixt these Nations, so as they should mutually aide each other in all things according to the strength, forme and effect treated at Westminster, and subscribed vnto at Petericke.

(72) As these were agreed vpon for the General, so other particulars were articulated with the King himselfe, which were as followeth.

1 That he should not bestow the administration of offices or benefices in the Realme of England, to any stranger or person not borne vnto the English subiection.

2 That his Court should be replenished with Gentlemen and Yeomen the Natiues of the Land.

3 That hee should make no inuasion of state against the Lawes and Customes of the Realme, neither violate the Priuiledges thereto belonging.

4 That hee should not carry the Queene out of her owne Dominions, without her special desire, nor none of her Children without consent of her Nobilitie.

5 That if shee should die issuelesse hee should Challenge no right in the Kingdom, but should suffer the succession to come to her next.

6 That he should not carry or suffer to be carried out of the Realme, either Jewels, or other things of especial estimation, but should faithfully keepe them for the profit of the English Crowne.

7 That hee should not suffer any ships, gunnes, Ordnance and other munition of warre to be conueied out of the Realme, but should fee all the Ports and Frontiers of the Land keepe, and the same sufficiently stored for their defence.

8 That neither directly nor indirectly, the Realme of England should bee intangled with the warres of his father, and the French King, neither that himselfe should giue any cause for the breach of peace betwixt the two Realmes.

(73) Things thus ordered, with consent of all parties, the marriage with great state was solemnized at Winchester, vpon Wednesday being the 25. of Iuly and Saint James day, where the Emperours Embassadors presently pronounced, that in consideration of this marriage, their master had giuen vnto his sonne Philip, the Kingdomes of Naples and Ierusalem, where vpon their Titles by Garter King at Armes, was solemnely proclaimed with these stiles as followeth, Philip and Marie by the Grace of God, King and Queene of England, France, Naples, Ierusalem, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Princes of Spaine and Cieil, Archdukes of Austria, Dukes of Milan, Burgundie and Brabant, Counties of Hapsurge, Flanders and Tyroll.

(74) And according to the stiles, so was the Maiesty of their proceedings, hauing two Swords borne before them as they went from the Church; with other Emperiall Enignes of their great Magnificence; which nothing was lessened in their pal-

lage through London; where English eyes beheld Philip, after the affections of their owne hearts, some reioicing as Isaiah, that Ieroboams golden calves should be againe erected, and some sorrowing as Jacob, that the Brasen Serpent was not broken, all of them assured, that this Solomons Sufferance and his wiues zeale, would build againe the Altars that had bene cast downe.

(75) The experience wherof Queene Mary herselfe had giuen, euen before shee was crowned, in causing the Latine Seruice againe to bee said, in displacing the reformed Bishopps, and in publishing a most straight prohibition against preaching, and printed English Bookes: to all which some time-serving Church-men gaue their contents, scandalizing not onlie the liues of the ministers, but also the Scriptures translation, and the iust proceedings of King Edwards time; against all which, Maister Bourne in a publicke Sermon made at Pauls-Crosse (in the presence of the Lord Maior and Bonner his Master) so liberally inuighed, as that one of his Auditors with more distaste then discretion, and more zeale then Religion, threw a Dagger at him to his great danger, and no lesse feare.

(76) And againe the like offence was conceived against Doctor Pendleton, who in the next yeece after, and in the same place had a gunne desperately discharged against him: vnto such hatred their Doctrine did driue them, and vnto such sinne the ore-feruent affectioned lay many times exposed: And no lesse was that Diabolical deuise of certaine giddie reformers, who had taught a Maide so to speake in a wall, as her hearers beleued it was the voice of an Angel, being none other, but most seditious speeces, against the Queens proceedings, the Prince of Spaine, the Masse, and Confession. In mockage wherof also a Cat was hanged on a gallows nere vnto the Crosse in Cheape, her head thorn and wearing a vesture fashioned like vnto a Cope, her fore-feet tyed with around paper betwixt, like vnto the papisticall consecrated bread, and in that maner the eight of April was shewed by the Preacher at Pauls-Crosse both to the office and content of the Spectators; and to deride the ridiculous Idolatries of the time then in vye, vpon Easter day the same yeece, and in the same Cheape, as the Priest of Saint Pancrasse came to celebrate the resurrection, and after the accustomed manner put his hand into the Sepulchre for the Crucifix (therein purposely bestowed) when he vied the words of the Euangelist very deuotly: Surrexit non est hic, He is risen and no here: found it so indeed, for that his God was gotten away and could neuer after be found.

(77) These things (saith Fox) caused both the Queene, and bishopps, to conceiue an euill opinion of the Londoners; as too much fauouring of King Edwards reformation, for which cause Bonner commanded all Scriptures printings vpon their Churches walles, to bee blotted out; and many other iniunctions to be inquired after. But from these vain trifles let vs returne to more serious matters in the ensuing Historie.

(78) Queene Mary erecting the Masse, and leauing the title of Supremacy to the Pope, sent for her kinsman Cardinall Poole to bee her director in those great busineses, who had bene a long time in forraigne parts, and euer a fauourite vnto the See of Rome, whose life vntill this time, we will briefly run ouer, so many dependances of story relying vpon him.

(79) Hee was the sonne of Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the second child, and onely daughter of George Duke of Clarence, second brother vnto King Edward the fourth: whose youth was spent in literature at Magdalen Colledge in Oxford; and state increased by King Henrie his kinsman, in bestowing vpon him the Deanty of Excester. Then trauelled he into Italy, and at Padua studied seuen yeeres, in which

The life and story of Cardinall Poole.

Poole made Cardinal.

which time the King hauing abolished the Pope, hee was sent for into England, but refusing to returne, was proclaimed Traitor, and his Deanery giuen to another: which his losse was presently repaid by his holy Father, in making him Cardinal, & employing him in many Ambassages, both to the Emperor & French King, with whom hee dealt against K. Henry, and solicited others by letters to forsake his friendship and obedience, which his doing brought many into danger, and for which lastly his own mother lost her Head.

Poole elected Pope, Goodwin Iues of Bishops.

(78) Then was he made Legate of Viterbiom, where he determined to haue led a more quiet life: but Pope Paul the third summoning the obtruded Council of Trent, appointed Poole with two others to be his Vicegerents: Though indeed this Cardinal was none of the forward in the matter of iustification, vnto whose opinion therein he drew one Morvella learned Spaniard, who of purpose was sent to dispute the Popes Doctrine in that Councell.

(79) But this Holy father leaving his Chaire empty by death, a faction fell among the Electors, some for the French, and some for the Emperour, which last light vpon Poole, & choote him for Pope. He altogether Imperiall, desired a more orderly election supposing himselfe so gracious in the eyes of most that the same would be continued to his greater praise.

Poole accused by Cardinal Carraffa.

(80) But the French faction working vpon the aduantage, put therest in minde of the Emperials lacking of Rome, the imprisonment and tests that were made of the Pope, the absence of many Cardinals Electors, whose voices they knew not, yea and Cardinal Carraffa, a alledged particular exception against Poole the elected, charging him (as Pasquill likewise did) with incontinency of body as also of Heresie, for arguing vpon a iustifying faith in the Councell of Trent, for frequenting the company with Antonie Flaminius a knowne Protestant, and since he was Legate, that he neuer had punished that doctrine with death.

Poole againe choosen Pope.

(81) But these accusations, were rather to shrub off his faire top, that Carraffa himselfe might more eminently be scene, who thought if Poole failed, to be their fairest mark; wherein his pollicke expectation was farre ouerfene. For the English Cardinall so cleared himselfe, that the French Carraffa receiued disgrace, and all their voices went for Poole euen the same night, which he againe seemed to dislike of, saying, that his election should not be a worke of darkenes, and therefore willed them orderly to proceed vpon the next day; such assurance had his hopes conceiued, that hee thought deliniae had bene enforced to set the Papall Crowne vpon his Head.

(82) But whether it were his double delay, or his neglecting to strike when the yron was hot, the Electors change their determination, and choole the Cardinall of de Monte for Pope, who named himselfe Iulius the third, and he to congratulate Poole for his Backwardnes, enforced Carraffa to ask him forgiveness before they departed the Conclau: Poole thus disappointed of the Papall Chaire, retired himselfe vnto Verona, where in a Monastery of S. Bennets (which order he had assumed and was the Patron) he made his Residence, as desirous to leade a more contemplatiue life.

Cardinall Poole sent for by Queene Mary.

(83) But scarcely was he settled before he heard of King Edwards death, and a message sent from Queene Marie (who had bene brought vp vnder the Countesse his Mother) for his returne into England. Her affection towards him, he knew was very great both for his person, his learning and religion, and himselfe relied much vpon the old familiarity betwixt them, as also of his birth being of the blood roiall; for which causes he sore longed homeward, not doubting but if things stood as he thought, to get a dispensation, to lay off the Hat, and to put on a Crowne.

(84) But the Emperour mistrusting what this Prelate intended, found devices to hold him beyond Seas, vntill the match was concluded between Queene Mary and his Sonne. And hitherto Cardinall Poole applauded by the Pope, beganne now to enter into his frowne, for being in England, and Archbishop of Canterbury: his old aculer, the foresaid Carraffa, had in the meane while obtained the Papacy vnder the name of Paul the fourth: when as presently he lent Frier Peto, whom he consecrated Bishop of Sarum, and discharged Poole of his legatue power, which doings the Queene tooke so ill, that shee forbade Peto to enter the land, vntill a reconciliation was made betwixt the Pope and Cardinall Poole her kinsman. Which man as hath bene saide, for soliciting Potent Princes against King Henry, in the quarrell of Rome, had runne in great displeasure with the English, whereby some Acts of Parliament were made against him: all which were now repealed, and Lord Reinald Poole receiued as an Angell of God, vnto whom that honorable house presented a Petition, to bee receiued againe into the bosome of Rome.

A.D. 1553.

(85) The suite casily granted, and abolition giuen, all things proceeded at the deuotion of the Romanists. Images were commanded to be erected againe in the Churches: Holy-water, Pax, and Censures, imploied at the Celebration of their Masses and Mattens: Oyle, Creame, and Spittle, vied in the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptisme. Altars furnished with Pictures, Costly Coverings, & the Crucifix thereon solemnly placed: vnto whom Lights, Candles, and Tapers, with great adoration were offered, and all to Captiuat the senses of the zealous Beholder, in which zeale Queene Marie her selfe gaue a full testimoniall, in restoring againe all Ecclesiasticall liuings assumed to the Crowne, saying, that shee felt more by the saluation of her owne soule, then shee did by tenne Kingdomes: A worthy speech verily, and good example of a Prince, but slowly followed of many meane subiects, who in this case doe rather muffle the mouth of the Oxe, that treadeth out their Corne, then suffers such as serue at the Altar, to liue by the Altar.

(86) And surely so well inclined was Mary of her selfe, that had not the zeale of her religion, and the authority of Churchmen ouer swaied her owne disposition, the flames of their consuming fires had not mounted so high. But woe to the procurer of those fixe Articles, (for which many had died) enacted by King Henry the eight, whose rigour in some sort himselfe had both qualified and repealed, which were againe put in practice, especially two, the one of them touching life, and the other losse of goods; which last was the separation of man and wife, the greatest offence to mutual society, and naturall affection, as can be committed; & that of life so tyrannically followed, as the Law it selfe may seeme with Dracos to be writ in blood, for within the compass of lesse then foure yeeres continuance, there died no lesse, for the testimoniall of their confidence in this case, then two hundred seauenty and seauen persons without regard of degree, sexe or age.

(87) In the heate of whose flames were consumed fise Bishops, one and twenty Diuines, eight Gentlemen, eighty foure Artificers, one hundred husbandmen seruants and labourers, twenty fixe wiues, twenty widowes, nine Virgins, two boyes, and two Infants, one of them whipped to death by B. spiritual body, to be spiritually receiued in the blessed Sacrament of his supper.

(86) The rigour therefore that fell from his mouth, who wished many more had so suffered, when the sword was so drawne, is farre from the precept and suferance of Christ, that would haue euen tares grow vnpluckt, till his harvest were in, and yet if those be his sheepe that follow his voyce, and his word sufficient to make the man of God perfect as himselfe, and Apostle hath taught, then were these excusable by their Aduerfaries testimonies, whose Prolocutor in a Conuocation assembled, publicly confessed that these delected Ministers had the word, but the Prelates in place the possession of the sword; which how they then made it drunke with the blood of Gods Saints, let him that hath the two edged sword in his mouth, at the great day of trial declare, to whose iudgement and merie I leaue them.

(87) Sixty foure more were persecuted for their profession and faith, whereof seauen were whipped, fixteene perished in prison, and were buried in dunghils, many lay in captiuitie condemned, but were releafed, and saued by the happy entrance of peaceable Elizabeth and many fled the Land in those daies of distresse, amongst whom most memorable is that of Katherine Dutcheffe of Suffolke, with her husband Richard Bartie Esquire, whose Story and troubles happened as followeth.

(88) This Lady Katherine was the only daughter, and sole heire of Lord William Baron of Willoughby, and of Eresby; and the last wife of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke lately deceased, in whose time how shee affected the Papall Profession, in massing, and maskings, was made knowne by cloathing a dogge in a Rocher, and calling him Gardiner, and againe, in the daies of King Edward, Gardiner saluting her from his prison windowe in the Tower, shee told him it was well with the Lambes now the wolfe was shut vp. These sturcke fore vpon the Bishops stomacke, who being now risen to bee Lord Chancellor of England, and in the disgrace with the Queene for her match in marrying Master Bartie a man too inferiour for her high estate, he thought it a fit time and occasion to requite, and to that end sent for Master Bartie her husband, charging him to be indebted foure thousand pound to the Queene, which was owing her by his Ladies late husband the Duke of Suffolke, vnto whom hee was Execucur, but this was onely the trayne of a false fire, and the Dutcheffe religion, the marke he ayimed at, for whom Master Bartie so wisely wrought, as himselfe was appointed to be her perswader, and so inwardly grew with the Lord Chancellor, that by his meanes he obtained licence to trauell beyond Seas, for a debt owing to his Dutcheffe by the Emperour.

(89) Bartie being gone, and Lady Katherine secretly to follow, vpon the first of Iannarie with foure men, two women, and her young daughter, her selfe apparelled like a Merchants wife, from Lyon Key in London departed, the morning very misty, and her heart fraught with feare; for no sooner was shee gone, than newes thereof came to the Court, and search made after her, as farre as to Leigh, before her Barke could attaine to the place: where being shrowded by a Marchant vnder the name of his daughter, shee escaped to Sea; but twice her shippe with contrary windes was driuen to the same shoare, to her great danger and no little griefe; yet lastly, shee arriued in Brabant where shee met with her husband: whence (being clad like a freet) they came into Cleueland, and at Stanton seated themselves, till further prouision could be made.

(90) But the Townsmen suspecting they were not the Persons they went for, and the Bishoppe of Norwiche hearing that they were Protestants, purposed with the Magistrate to impeach their liberties, which Bartie hearing of, with his Froe and daughter, attended onely with two seruants suddenly made a way vnto Wefell, a Towne priuiledged with the Stiliard in London. In trauell they were ouertaken by night, the weather was rainie, and the thaw vpon a great frost, made the way more deepe, in which distresse his two seruants he sent to seek some reliefe, whilst himselfe (the surer on foot) bare the childe; and the Dutcheffe to ease him carried his Rapier and Cloke.

(91) Thus passing thorow mire, dirt, and darke night, about futen of the Clocke, all wet and wearie, they got vnto Wefell, where, he being suspected to be a Launce-knight, and see his woman no better then naught, could get no entertainment, the language they had not, the childe cried pittifullie; the mother wept bitterly, the cold was extreme, and the raine powred downe as the cloudes had bene broken. In this distresse the Church-porch was thought vpon to throwde them from raine, and to that end Master Bartie sent his two seruants to buye Coales and straw: but repairing towards this his cold Inne, he met with two boyes that vnderstood Latine, of whom hee demanded for the Ministers house, who presently brought him to the place, where hee supped. His name was Persfell and had bene in England, where, of the Dutches he had receiued kind courtesie, and now at Wefell imploied his Ministry among certaine Wallons, who hearing that the Dutches was fled out of England, and that at Stanton shee liued norling safe, had procured for their abode in Wefell, without making knowne who these English were laue onely vnto the chiefe Magistrate.

(92) Master Bartie desiring to speake with the Minister, he presently came downe, who seeing the Dutches so disguised in apparel, and bemired in dirt, could not speake vnto her for teares, and bringing them in with glad hearts no doubt, Master Bartie changed apparell with the good man, the Dutcheffe with his wife, and their childe, with the childe of the house: and thus were they comforted by this good Preachers meanes.

(93) Heere they feated not long, but that a sudaaine watchword was sent them from Sir John Mason, Queene Marias Ambassador in Netherland, that the Lord Paget had faied an arrant to the Spaw, and that the Duke of Brunswicke with tenne Ancients, would passe by Wefell for the seruice of Austria, against the French King, by whom the Dutcheffe and her husband should be intercepted and deliuered vnto the Lord Paget.

(94) From hence therefore in haste they removed to the Town Wincheim in high Germany, which was seated in the Palgranes Dominions, where by his Protection they continued till their maintenance beganne to scant, and they also almost fainting vnder so heauy a burthen, began to faile of all hope. At which very instant (God so mouing the hearts of his Princes) the Palatine of Pilus, and the King of Pole hearing of their distresse, sent them a safe conduct, vnder the Palatines seale with assurance of maintenance, if they would come vnto those parts.

(95) From Wincheim therefore they forthwith departed, and in Waggon tooke towards Frankfurt, but by the Langranes Captaine were intercepted and set vpon in the high way, so that Master Bartie was forced to stand at defence, wherein the Captains Horse was slaine vnder him, and the cry maintained that he was slaine himselfe, whereupon Bartie by the counsell of the Dutcheffe, and swiftnes of his horse fled amaine, but was so eagerly followed vpon opinion of murder, that hee hardly escaped with life, yet lastly they got into Poland, where they were honorably entertained vntill the death of Queen Mary, whose life in the meane while let vs returne to relate.

(96) The Nouember next following her marriage, the Queene was reported to haue bene conceiued with child, for joy whereof T. Deane was commanded solemnly to be sung, and Processions, and Praiers, made for her safe deliuerance. The Queene tooke her Chamber, the Court was full of Midwives, and Gentlewomen attendants, Rockers were provided, the Cradle prepared, and all made so certain, that some were punished for making doubt of the contrary. Infomuch that it passed in Parliament, that if God should take away Queene Marie, this their young Master coming into the world, should find himselfe provided for; where it was by Act ordained, that King Philip should be Protector of her Issue, and Gouvernour of the Realmes, vntill their Prince or Princeesse should come to able yeeres.

(97) Howbeit as it should seme this Spanish King had little confidence in the English, for, at his first entrance, hee had the hall dore of his Court continually kept shut, neither any suffered to enter, vnlesse his busines was first made known: the Lords hauing leaue to depart London, had strait commandement to send all their harnesse and Artillerie to the Tower; which was done, in regard of the maligners of this marriage: yea and somewhat doubtfull hee was also of those, who in few bare him a faire face; the rather for that a Noble man in consultation, had giuen his counsell to cut off Lady Elizabeth head, assuring himselfe, that those so bad minded to their naturall Princeesse, could not bee better vnto him a stranger: who contrariwise vpon this ground so laid the foundation of his true honour, as it gained him loue of all true English hearts: for from that day he neuer left to sollicite his Queene for the deliuey of that innocent Princeesse her sister, who still remained a solitary Prisoner in Woodstocke, though no proofes could bee brought for any offence.

(98) At last his suit was obtained, and Lady Elizabeth brought vnto Hampton Court, hauing not scene the Queene for two yeeres before, here shee was lockt vp, and laid at by Gardiner to submit her selfe, till some fouretene dayes after, shee was sent for into the Queenes Chamber about tenn of the Clocke in the night; which she no sooner had entred, but falling vpon her knees, shee praised God to preferre her Soueraigne Maicesty; protesting her loyalty and truth to her person, whatsoever had bene spoken or instigated to the contrary. Vnto whom the Queene (somewhat sharply said, then you will not confesse your offence, I see; but rather stand stoutely vpon your truth? I pray God your truth may so fall out; If not (quoth the Princeesse) I request neither fauour nor pardon at your Maiesties hand: well, then said the Queene, you stand so stiffly vpon your own loyalty, belike you suppose to haue been wrongfully punished: I must not say so to your Maicesty said Lady Elizabeth: but you will then to report to others it seemeth, said Queene Mary: no, and it please your Maicesty said the Lady, I haue borne, and must beare the burthen my selfe, I most humbly beleeue your Graces good opinion of me, and to thinke mee your true Subject, which from the beginning hetherto I haue euer bene, and will be for euer so long as my life lasteth. The Queene replying in Spanish, said, God knoweth, and so they departed; K. Philip as is thought standing behind the Armes heard what was said.

(99) Some seuen dayes after, her Grace was discharged of Benefield her taylor, and had leaue of liberty, yet so, that Sir Thomas Pope a Priuie Counsellor, and M. Gage the Queenes Gentleman Vther, were still her Attendants all Queene Maries time: her Gentlewoman Mistresse Aspley was sent to the Fleet, and three other waiting maides vnto the Tower; but the death of Gardiner immediately following, these stormes grew more calmer, and Lady Elizabeth euery day more affectionately respected.

(100) About this time, William Constable, alias Fetherston, a Millers sonne in the North, bruted himselfe to bee King Edward the fixt, but was seconded by none of any esteeme, and therefore the lesse dangerous or likely to bee beleueed. Notwithstanding all diligent search was laid for the Counterfeit; and hee lastly taken at Elham in Kent, from whence to Hampton Court hee was presently conuied, where his answeres were so simple, that hee was cleemed as a frantick, and sent to the Marshall-See for a Lunaticke foole: and from thence in a Cart this counterfeite king (whose Crowne was a paper inscribed with his fault) was brought vnto Westminster, and from thence whipp'd vnto Smithfield, whence hee was banished into the North, and without further punishment was so releafed: But this Fetherston the next yeere (as a dogge returning to his vomit) gaue it forth that K. Edward was aliue, whereupon he was again apprehended, condemned of Treason, and hanged at Tyburne.

(101) Now the expected time of Queene Maries deliuerance being fully approached, a rumor ranne in London and elsewhere; that a Prince was borne for ioy whereof the Bels were rung, the Bonfires flamed, Processions made, and some in their Sermons described the beauty of that goodly boy, and great Prince. At Antwerpe also the like triumphes were made by the English Marchantes, the Mariners shooting off their Ordinance; for which an hundred Pistols were sent them from the Lady Regent; but these flying reports proued but wind, which turned the Vane shortly into another point; for the truth bursting forth, told for a certaine, that the Queene had neuer bene conceiued, neither indeed was euer like to bee: which raised as many doubts, as had bene tales of her deliuerance: some affirming that shee was with Child, but miscarried, some, that shee was deceiued by a Tympany: and some that this rumor was spread for a policy: but what the truth was faith Grafton, I referre vnto others that know more.

(102) King Philip thus frustrate of his hope for his Heire, vpon the fourth of September went ouer the Seas to visite his Father the Emperour, and to take possession of the Low-Countries, where hee stayed one yeere and six moneths, to the great griefe of Queene Mary his wife, whom as some thought hee little affected, and this his long stay made the suspition no lesse. But now returning to Doer, hee was by his Queene met on the way, and brought through London, accompanied with many Peeres of the Realme, as in triumph against a Coronation.

(103) In whose absence many Conspiracies had bene intended, but their foggy smoakes were vtterly extinguished before the fire could burst into flame: for certaine persons plotting to robbe the Queenes Exchequer at Westminster, meant with the money to raise warre in the Land; the Leaders into this attempt were Henry Peckham, John Daniel, Richard Vdall, John Throckmorton, John Deshiche, William Stanton, William Roffey, John Beadell and White, the reuealer of the same intendments. These all excepting White, were at sundry times executed, and Sir Anthony Kingston apprehended for the same, died on the way vnto London.

(104) The like sturres were attempted by one Cleber a Schoolemaster, sometime at Dys in Norfolke, who in the Parrish Church of Yarle, among a great assembly at the celebration of a marriage, stood vp and read a penned, but traitorous proclamation against the Queene, perswading the people to take Armes, and to free the land of wrongs done by strangers.

(105) So likewise Thomas Stafford, second sonne to the Lord Stafford, with other Conspirators against the King and Queene, fearing the iust punishments for their desert, had fled the land into parts beyond the Seas, from whence attempting still to broach their Rebellions, they sent certaine bookes and letters written and printed, full of most slanderous vntruthes: and now following King Philip into England, assisted by some English and strangers, tooke by stealth the Castell of Scarborough in Yorkshire, where hee published a most shameful proclamamation against the Queene, traiterously affirming that shee was neither rightfull, nor worthy of raign, and that the King had giuen vnto his Spaniards the greatest and strongest hold of the land. But by the prowesse of Thomas Pearsey (presently created Earle of Northumberland) hee was surpris'd, sent to London, and there made shorter by the head. All these sturres quieted, new troubles were rather fought for then ministred, and more losse followed to Englands dishonour, then glory had bene gained by this Spanish great March.

(106) For the Emperour ouer-worne with the affaires of the world, and wearied with the troubles of turmoiling wars, or rather touched with remorse of conscience for the infinite miseries brought by him vpon Florence, Naples, Sicilie, Tuscane, Elbe, and Calabria, being periwaded that these mournfull iuries of Christian Princes had giuen to the Turke aduantage vpon diuers parts of Europe, hee called his sonne King Philip of England vnto Brussels (as is said) where, by authenticke letters bearing date the five and twentieth of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him, commanding all his estates and subiects to acknowledge and hold him their lawfull King; and among many other instructions and most wise exhortations, gaue him charge chiefly to hold amity with the French, lest otherwise the warres of those Puissant Nations might oppress all Christendome.

(107) King Philip indeed was much inclined to peace, and Queene Mary his wife at that time much more, both to hold him with her at home, & to support the Religion which shee had raised, by restoring the Clergie their wonted possessions, whereof much was then held in the Noblemens hands, from whose hard-hold, hardly could any thing bee wrested; but those in her owne, shee freely resigned by Parliament, with this most Christian resolution, and princely saying: that shee set more by the saluation of her owne Soule, then shee did by the reueneues of ten Kingdomes, and so committed the restauration and dispose thereof vnto the Pope and Cardinall Poole his Legate, to the great wealth of the Church, and empouering of the Crowne.

(108) King Philip following his fathers aduise, made peace with France to continue for five yeeres, which no sooner was made, then was again broken, but most of all to the losse of the English: for the Kings did not loue, though their weapons were laid downe, and ancient hatred bred daily new discontent: one principall was ministred by Pope Paul the fourth, then an enemy vnto the Spaniard, whom Duke Alua had mued vp within the wallies of Rome. His hope of helpe was in Henry the French King, vnto whom hee sent a triumphant hatte, with a stately Sword, and thereupon had succour by the Guyse, who by force made his way open into Rome: But the French decreasing for want of pay, and the Spaniard still raising their Trophies of victory, the Pope thought it fittest to hold with the strongest, & so made frustrate his amity with the French.

(109) Queene Mary of England, now the Pope was for Spain, and Philip her husband preparing for France, to shew her great loue and obedience to both, rather fought an occasion against King Henry, then any ministred by him for the breach of peace. Her pretences were many, as that the French King had initiated one Dudley and Ashton, vnto a new conspiracy, which they consulted vpon in his Ambassadors house in London, and being reuealed, fled into France, where they were maintained by an annual pension. The like shee alledged against King Henry for succouring of Stafford, and his rebellious complices, for suffering his Pyrats to molest her Seas, & for want of more, renewed the remembrances of Northumberland and Wyatts rebellions, who as was alledged, were supported by him.

(110) These things premised, a defiance was sent into France, and was pronounced vnto Henry at Rennes by Clarenceaux King at Armes. The French King loth to heare of these warres made his answer and preparations accordingly: and Queene Mary contrary to promise, entangling her subiects with the quarrels of the Spaniards, with sound of Trumpet in London proclaimed warres against France. To prosecute which, King Philip her husband passed ouer to Calles, and thence into Flanders, where hee made prouision to enter the field: after whom the Queene sent a thousand horsemen, foure thousand footmen, and two thousand Pioners, and the Earle of Pembroke was appointed Capitaine Generall, vnder whom in severall places serued Vicount Montacute, the L. Grey of Wilton, the Earle of Rutland, the Earle of Lincolne, the Earle of Bedford, the Earle of Leicester, and the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Howard, Dela Ware, Windfor, Bray, Shandoy, and Dudley, with many other Knights of approved valiancy.

(111) These passing the Seas, ioined with King Philip, whilst the Dukes of Saoy and Brunsuicke, the Earles of Esmond, Horne, and Mansfield, had invaded the French confines, and planned a strong siege before Saint Quintins, to whose rescue Monsieur Montmorancy Constable of France came with nine hundred men at Armes, as many light horsemen, seauen hundred Raifers, twenty two Ensignes of Lancequenets, and sixteen Ensignes of the French: and thus furnished, he meant to put more Souldiers into the Towne, but in the assay lo miscarried, that himselfe was both hurt & taken prisoner with eight Noblemen more, all of them Knights of the Order, and not many dayes after, King Philip with his English came to the siege, by whose maine prowesse Saint Quintins was taken, for ioy whereof great triumphes were made in England, which long lasted not, through the losse of Calles.

(112) For this great victory made the English both negligent and carelesse, so that the Towne of Calles, and the Forts thereabout for defence, were vnrespectively regarded, and besides the neglect of supply to those peeces, the Souldiers thinking al out of danger, stood gazing at the shadow till the substance was lost: for the French being netted, that S. Quintins was Phillips, let slippe no occasion wherein was aduantage: and the Duke of Guise employing the Constables place, determined to put in proofe an enterprize for Calles, which long and many times had bene purposed vpon.

(113) This danger fore-seene, intelligence thereof was sent into England, but no supply heard of, first the Matter of the Ordinance posited to the Councell, and secondly followed the Capitaine of the Castell himselfe, but either by wilfull negligence or lacke of credite with the Queene and Councell, those busineses in France were slenderly regarded, vntill the supply was altogether too late. For the Duke of Guise with a marvellous celerity approached the English Frontier, vnder a colour to victuall Bologne and Arde, and vpon a little forry plate of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and thence diuiding his Army into two partes, sent the one vnto Ricebanke, whilst the other laid battery to two Forts at once, both which hee wanne within the space of twelue howres, the Capitaine and Souldiers secretly departing to Calles. The like successe had the French against Ricebanke, being abandoned by the English Souldiers, and left to the Guize and his dispose.

(114) Then were Canons mounted against Calles it selfe, and with continual battery for three dayes together, a breach made in the wall, not farre from the Wwater-gate, but yet vnassailable, the English within so maintained the defence: this then a trainge of false fire (for the French neuer meant their access that way) whilst all attended to make good the breach, the Duke had planted fiftene double Canons against the Castell, which once perceived, the Callesians knowing their resistance to weake, stood

Callis surrendred to the French.

(117) The Lord Wentworth then Deputie of the Towne seeing all in like danger if meanes were delayed, sent vnto the Castle to haue a Parlee for composition, which the French forthwith accepted, and sent out two Gentlemen for pledges whilest Iohn Heisfeld Master of the Ordinance, and Edward Hall Constable of the Castle, concluded vpon these dishonourable Articles, as followeth:

Vnhonourable Articles.

1 That the Towne, the great Artillery, Victuals and munition should bee yeilded freely to the French.

2 That the liues of all the inhabitants should bee saued, and haue their safe conduct to depart.

3 That the Lord Deputy with fifty others whom the Duke would appoint, should remaine prisoners and be put to their ransome.

The hard vsage of the English.

(116) Things thus ordered, the English were commanded into the Churches of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas, where they remained that whole day, the night following, and vntill the next day in the afternoone, without either meate or drinke, in which time the Duke of Guize commanded by Proclamation that all Jewels, Plate and Money to the value of a groate should bee laid vpon the Altar, and that vpon paine of death, a sorrowfull offertory towards the English, and a great enrichment vnto the French. Then was the Towne voided of five hundred ordinary Souldiers (a small Garrison indeed to man such a place) of Townsmen, women and children, foure thousand two hundred; the Lord Wentworth Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlaine Captaine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Captaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimston, Iohn Rogers, and others, to the number of fifty were sent prisoners into France vntill ransome were paid: And thus the Town & Forts that were won by the victorious *K. and wonne in the depth of Winter to the worlds wonder, and great suspicion of treachery, which happened the seuenteenth day of Ianuary, and in the same moneth were surrendered the strong forts of Guizes, and Hames, whereby all the English footing was lost in the Continent of France.

(117) This winning of Callis & the other strong holds as they were ioyous to the French, and with Te Deum & Bonfires celebrated with no lesse solemnity, then was that for the recovery of the County Oye, & the fort won from the English in An. 1347. so was it greuous vnto the English Nobility, and most of al vnto Queene Marie her selfe. Insomuch as shee ceased not to trauell with the King and Councel how to couer the dishonour of her Raigne, by this losse of Callis; and albeit some affaies were made against Breeft, and Mounseur Thermes the new Captaine of Callis taken prisoner by Countie Egmont General for King Philip in the Low Countries, yet the maine was neglected, and could not be recovered for any composition, which stroke so deepe a melancholy into Queene Maries minde, as shee letted not to say, that the losse of Callis was written in her heart, and might therein bee read when her body should bee opened. In which passions she continued the rest of her Raigne, which neuer had bene very prosperous, nor greatly pleasurable vnto her selfe, after shee had abolished the Gospell, restored the Popes Supremacy, and married a stranger, who was vnto her a stranger indeede.

(118) Of al since the Conquest her Raigne was the shortest, only excepting that of Richard the Tyrant, but much more bloody then was his, and more blood spilt in that short time of her Raigne, then had bene shed for case of Christianity, in any Kings time since Lucius the first establissher of the Gospell in this Realme. Her conceptions failing, extreame dearths raging, hurt done by thunders from heauen, and by fire in the royall Nauie, forraigne losses, Callis surrendered, and King Philip keeping from Court, daily augmented Queene Maries melancholy, which lastlie increasing to a burning feauer made an end of her life, at her Mannor of *S. Tower, and all complements prepared for her Coronation. In which time Proclamations came forth, forbidding any man to preach but by appointment, or to alter any Ceremonies, but according to the rites in her owne Chappell, as also that the Letanie, the Epistles and Gospels should be read in all Churches in the English tongue.

(3) All things in a readines vpon the fourteenth of January, with great triumphes and sumptuous shewes, shee passed through London towards Westminster to receive the Imperiall Crowne; but before shee entered her Chariot for the Tower, acknowledging that the seat was Gods into which shee was to enter, and the his Vicegerent to wield the English Scepter; in that royall assembly with eyes and hands elevated to heauen vpon her knees, shee prayed for his assistance, as Salomon did for wisdom when hee tooke the like charge; with a thankfull remembrance vnto God for his continued preferuation, who had brought her through great dangers vnto that present dignity. In which triumphall State as shee passed through the Streets of London, when the Booke of God was presented vnto her at the little Conduit in Chape, shee received the same with both her hands, and kissing it, laid it to her breast saying, that the same had euer bene her chiefe delight, and should bee the rule by which he meant to frame her gouernment. And to testify her benigne acceptance of the Lord Maior, and Citizens approoued loues, she assured them that she lacked no will, nor (as shee hoped) power to bee to them as gracious a Prince as euer reigned in the Land, and that for the publike good, if occasion were ministred shee would spend her dearest blood.

(4) The fifteenth of January (being Sunday) the Coronation was solemnly performed, and the Imperiall Crowne set on her head by Doctor Owen Ogilthorpe Bishoppe of Carlisle, the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury being vacant euer since her entrance, by the death of Cardinall Poole, who died the same day that Queene Mary did.

(5) Presently there followed a Parliament, wherein the Title of Supremacy was againe restored to the Crowne, with the first fruits, and Tenth of all Ecclesiasticall liuings, and the Booke of Common Prayer ratified for an vniforme celebration of Gods diuine seruice in the English Churches; as also those Acts repealed, that were enacted by Queene Marie, in fauor of the Romish Religion. Things thus established, and liberty giuen to the Gospell, many that had fled the Realm in case of conscience, returned, and were provided for according to their worthes, and that Gods Truth might be established, (which thing her princely heart chiefly fought after) a conference was commanded and begunne at Westminster the last of March, concerning certain Articles to be discussed amongst the Diuines. The Propositions were three.

1 It is against the worde of God, and custome of the ancient Church, to use a tongue unknowne to the people, in common Prayer, and the Administration of the Sacraments.

2 Euery Church hath authority to appoint, take away, and change Ceremonies, and Ecclesiasticall rites, so the same be to edification.

3 It cannot be proued by the word of God, that there is in the Masse offered up a sacrifice propitiatory for the quicke and the dead.

The Impugnations of these Assertions were,

The Bishop of Winchester,
The Bishop of Lichfield,
The Bishop of Chester,
The Bishop of Carlisle,
The Bishop of Lincoln,
D. Cole,
D. Harpsfield,
D. Langdall,
D. Chesley.

The Defendors of those Assertions were,

D. Scorie,
D. Coxo,
M. Whitehead,
M. Grindall,
M. Horne,
M. Gell,
M. Elmer,
M. Jewell.

These being solemnly set with many Honourable Counsellors among them, before the Conference could well beginne, it was finally ended, and all through the default of the Bishops (as Stow hath alledged) who, first pleaded a mistaking of their directions, and in the next sitting, vterly refused either to write their owne, or to read the others reasons, whereby all was vndone that was intended, and whereof a part was * imprinted as it yet to bee seene.

(6) During the time of this Parliament a Petition was made vnto her Maiesty for the hope of roiall Issue, to moue her vnto marriage; vnto which eloquent Oration deliuered by the Speaker, shee replied with great thanks for their louing care for her, and their owne Country: but as touching their request, shee answered, that from the time, when first she considered her selfe to bee borne a seruitor of God, shee happily did choofe, and in truth best liked a Virgins life, from which, neither Ambition of high marriages, which had been formerly offered her by her Prince, nor the grieuances sustained by her, whiles shee liued among those enemies, whose indignation was death, had hitherto bene able to diuert her: but whether her yeeres and answer could concord together in their iudicious minds; she certainly knew not; yet this she assured them, that as then she stood so affected, and if that affection changed, her choise should bee onely of such a one, as should bee as careful, shee would not say, as herselfe, (because shee knew her selfe best) but as any of them for the Realmes good, and yet withall she considered, that although her selfe, for their welfare (if neede were) would not shunne death, yet might her Issue, (as often hapneth to the best parents) grow out of kind, and proue vngenerous. And therefore to leaue behind her a more lasting and gratefull remembrance, shee held it sufficient, that a Marble-stone should declare to posterities, that shee "a Queene had raigned, liued, and dyed a Virgin: and so with many thanks dismissed the assembly. How the first was accomplished, wee that liued vnder her raigne haue seene; but how insufficient that one stone is to containe, & continue the remembrance of her vertuous, pious, and glorious gouernment, the whole world doth at this day, and shall to all succeeding ages witness, whilest the Earth rests in the Center, and the Heauens haue restlesse mouings.

(7) For the cause of Religion shee sent into Germany touching a league defensiu, the Pope troubling the waters of that cleare fontaine, and disabling her Title with the calumnie of illegitimation. In the meane while a peace being on foot betwixt the Kings of France and Spaine, Queene Elizabeth also interposed for England, wherein the restoring of Callis was a maine point, whereupon her Highnesse stood, which was thus.

(8) For the Earle of Arundell, the Bishoppe of Ely, and Doctor Wotton Deane of Canterbury remaining Commissioners in France at the death of Queene Mary, vpon composition for the regaining of Callis, & other peeces lost in the cause of K. Philip: her Maiesty sent them instructions to continue their demands, and certain sure grounds whereon they might worke. The first was that the quarrell of war was not England, but Philips of Spaine, in whose fauour Queene Mary his wife against the will of her Council, sent him aid of her Subjects. And in case the Shee claimeth restitution of Callis from the French.

Ex MS. The instructions of Q. Elizabeth sent to the Commissioners.

French should challenge Callis as inhereditary vnto the Crowne of France, to that they should answer, that there were many Signiories and places in France, wherunto the English might make their iust claime, and some in possession since Callis was English, which Towne was not onely Lawfully granted, and assured from the French themselves vnto the Crowne of England, but was also allowed by Articles of all treaties of peace, for the space of two hundred yeeres and more, this euermore specially provided, that Callis should remaine in the quiet possession of the English.

And the better to impress the deliuey of Callis, in the mould of the French, they were to demand certain arrearages, wherein their King and Realme had fallen for great summes of monies and debts accruing to the English Crowne: as well by the acknowledgement of the mother of King Francis then being Regent of France, and iudgement thereupon giuen; as also by the treaty of More, de Date, 1525. The treaty of perpetual peace, de Date, 1527. and the late treaty between King Henry the eighth, and King Francis, for the deliuey of Bullain, de dato, 1546. by all which appeareth, that there was two Millions of Crownes due, and very little thereof yet paid, the copies of which treaties and confession, the said Commissioners haue with them. Also another debt of an hundred thousand crownes, as appeareth by a Bill of King Francis hand. And where also there is one perpetual pension of fiftie thousand crownes due, as appeareth by the treatie of perpetual peace, and another pension of Sale, as appeareth by the same treatie. All which notwithstanding, rather then the French should retaine Callis, her maiesty was contented to remit the whole debt and arrearages: but without that in no wise shee held it convenient to conclude peace with France, and that obtained, shee remitted the other Articles to the discretion of the Commissioners. But the English Queene was no more desirous to haue Callis, then the French King vnwilling to let it goe. Whereupon lastly it was thus concluded, That Callis should remaine French, the tearme of eighty yeeres, and those expired, should returne to the English vpon forfeiture of fife hundred thousand crownes; the branch of which agreement, from the Latine, and that from the original, is thus translated.

(9) It is covenanted, agreed, and concluded, that the said most noble Lady Queene of England, shall suffer and permit the foresaid most Christian King of France, his heires and successors, to hold, possesse, and peaceably enjoy, from the day of the date of this present treaty, vntill the terme of eighty yeeres following, the Towne of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices belonging to the same, and also the port or haue of the said Towne, with the Tower of Kuybank, and also the Towers, Lordships, villages, and places of Newmainbridge, Merke, Oye, Ham, Sandgate, the Tower and Towne of Gains, and all the rest of that County taken in this last warre, and all other Townes, Castles, Villages, Lands, Dominions, Territories, Waters, Rivers, Hauens, Defences, Forts and Shores, and generally all places whatsoever situate vnto them by the sea, which the said most Christian King hath gotten in this last warre, and taken by force of Armes, in the raigne of the most noble Lady Mary, late Queene of England. And the said most Christian King, hath promised, and doth promise as well in his owne name, as in the name of the King Dauphin his sonne, his heires, and successors, for which Dauphin, the said most Christian King hath made himselfe, and doth make himselfe answerable, promising that hee will take care of, and effect that the said King Dauphin shall approve this treaty, and ratifie it, within two monthes after the date of this treaty, which said terme of eighty yeeres being complete and ended, the said most Christian King his heires and successors shall presently without delay, relinquish, deliuer, and restore, or cause to be deliuered, and restored to the said most noble Prince Elizabeth, Queene of England, her heires, and successors, or to those that should bee thereunto deputed by her, or her heires and successors, the said town of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices aforesaid, and all other and singular places aforesaid, and also the Towers, Castles, and fortresses whatsoever in the aforesaid parts, and also the places now of late builded, fortified, or reedified during the said terme of eighty yeeres; and the said most Christian King his heires and successors shall leaue the possession of all the said places, and depart from it, and wholly forsake the same. So that the most noble Lady Queene Elizabeth, her heires and successors may peaceably enjoy, and quietly hold the possession of them, with all the rights, priuiledges, preeminences, superiorities, recognition, and all other authorities in the like manner, state, condition and nature in which the Kings of England haue held them, and possessed them before the beginning of this last warre. Provided notwithstanding, and expressly covenanted, that the said most Christian King, his heires and successors shall not be bound to restore or deliuer the Townes and Fortresses, and places aforesaid, otherwise then in the same state, manner, and condition, in which now at this present they are, and hereafter shall be strengthened and fortified by them, during the said terme, yet so notwithstanding as neither in the time of such restitution nor before, that there be not any thing done of set purpose, whereby the former state of the strengthes, and fortifications which now it is in, or which hereafter added by them, bee in any wise minished, broken, or overthrowne, but that all things without fraude, bee restored intire and unimpaired, in manner aforesaid.

Also it is covenanted and agreed, that during the terme of the said eighty yeeres, it shall neither bee lawful for the said Christian King, nor for the said most fortunate King and Queene of Scots, nor for the said most happy Queene of England to inuade, attempt, or enterprize by warre any thing against each other, or for any one of them against the other, or against the Kingdomes, proper dominions, and Subiects of each other, either directly or indirectly, to the preiudice of this present treatie, &c. And likewise if any thing shall bee so inuaded and attempted by the said most Christian King, and most happy King and Queene of Scots, or the Subiects of them, by the authority, commandement, and approbation of them, or any of them. Then the said most Christian King, and King Dauphin, their heires and successors, by such kinde of inuasion attempted, vpon the deed done, shall bee bound and obliged to leaue and depart from the possession and occupation of the said Towne of Callis, and of all other places aforesaid on this side the sea, taken of late from the English, by the said most Christian King. And all those things they shall deliuer and restore without any delay to the said most worthy Queene of England, in the same manner and forme, in which at the said terme of eighty yeeres, they were promised and covenanted to be restored: which restitution if it shall not be so made, the said Marchants and pledges shall be bound to pay the said penalty of fife hundred thousand Crowns to the said most worthy Queene of England, and the covenant notwithstanding of restoring the said Towne shall neuertheless remaine in force. Moreover if any of the Subiects of any of the Princes aforesaid, of their owne authority, shall endeavour or attempt any thing against the Subiects of either of the said Princes in preiudice of this Treatie, he shall be punished as an infringer of the peace, according to the quality of the fact.

These covenants notwithstanding they were sealed and thorne vnto, yet were neuer performed at the yeeres of expiration, though Marchants were bound, and hostages assigned to remaine in England till the money were paid.

(9) So suspiciously had this Towne of Callis bene recovered from the English, that the Lord Wentworth (the Deputie) was indicted in Queene Marias daies, and now arraigned at Westminster; the Marquess of Northampton being his Judge; and Lord Chiefe Steward of England for that day; but that Nobleman so nobly defended himselfe, that he was acquitted by his Peeres, and was a most honourable opinion for his many and faithful seruices.

Articles propounded to Scottish Bishops and Peeres.

The Scottish Bishops answers.

English are from all Papall infection, and established Peace, the greatest benefit for the Subject; on the fourteenth of May, being Whitsunday, Divine Service began to be celebrated in the English tongue, whereby Gods Trumpet might be heard in a perfect found, and the praises of the Congregation vnted with an understanding heart. To the end therefore that the Clergy, the Teachers of others, should not be infected themselves, the Oath of Supremacy, with other Articles, was offered vnto them, the refusers whereof were forthwith deprived, and others furogated that were more loially affected. In place of Poole deceased, Doctor Parker was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, and of York, Doctor Younge in steade of Heth, who refused the Oath; and so of some others: then went fourth Commissioners to suppress those Monasteries restored by Queene Marie, and to call out those Images set vp in Churches, whose sight hauing heated the blinde zeale of many poore ignorant people in places of Oratory, were now themselves in the streets confumed in the fire, at whose flames might be said, as in 1. Iahab touching peeces of like stuffe, had beene said: I am warme, I haue bene at the fire.

(11) After the reducing of this purer worship into Gods Church, the next care the Good Queene tooke, was to enrich her Realme, by reducing her Coynes into fine and pure Sterling, and debasing of Copper monies: causing likewise great store of Munition, Armour and Powder to be brought into the Land, and laid vp in a readines as occasion should serue, that nothing might be wanting either for the wealth or safety of the Subiect.

But these her blessed beginnings in England were little as it seemeth to the liking of the French King, Whose hope (saith Leslie) by certaine acts of Parliament made by Queene Marie against her sister the Lady Elizabeth, to debarre her from the succession of the Crowne, was to establish Queene Marie of Scotland, who had lately married Prince Dolphine his sonne, laying her title from Margaret the eldest daughter of King Henrie the seventh, linked in Marriage with James the fourth King of that name, she being the daughter of King James the fifth his sonne. And therefore as the neere in blood, and lawfull heire to the Crowne of England, he caused by Proclamation in Paris her Title to be published under the name of Mary Queene of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and caused the Armes of England to be joyned with Scotland and France, which the Dolphine and shee did impute, both in their Seales, Plate, Tapistrie, and other adornments; which caused great troubles (saith hee) betwixt the Kingdomes of England, France, and Scotland.

(13) In Scotland Religion (as England had embraced it) beganne to be practised; Preachers spake boldly, and bookes were daily brought thither, which nothing at all commended the Pope, and by them (saith the Bishop) the people were moued to a sedition, which to preuent, the Queene Regent caused an assembly of the Bishops and Barons, vnto whom the Ministers presented these Articles.

1 That their diuine praiser and publicke administration of the Sacraments should be in the English tongue.
2 That Bishops and other Ecclesiasticall benefices should be bestowed vpon qualified men.
3 That such persons enjoying the profits, should performe their duties and preach the word to the people.
4 That none should be admitted in time to come, into the Ministry, vnlesse his life and learning were answerable to that excellent calling.

(14) To the two first, the Bishops alleging the customes of the Romane Church, would in no wise consent, leauing euery man at liberty privately to pray in what language he best liked; and the election of their Bishops to the prescription of the Queene. For the two latter, they affirmed, no better order could be prescribed then that of their Common Law, which imposed vpon them, as much as was required; and thereupon they began to put the same in execution, commanding all that had charge of soules to fit themselves to their functions, otherwise to looke for no fauour from deprivation, after the terme of like moneths. Which was (saith the same Author) the principall cause, that a great number of young Abbots, Priors, Deacons, and beneficed men, did forsake the enterprise, and practised deuises for the overthrow of the Catholike Religion.

(15) True it is, that at the preaching of John Knox, and other Ministers affecting reformation, not onely the Images, Altars, and other like things of abuse, were cast downe and burnt, but also the Charterhouse of the Friars at Perth destroyed, which was the fairest Abbey in the Realme of Scotland; then followed the ouerthrow of the Monasteries of Saint Andrewes, of Stone, of Strickling, and of Linlithgow; which ouerhasty proceedings caused such stirres in the Land, that the Lords of the Combination encamped at Comper, to abide battle against the French (who came into Scotland to impeach their purposes) had not the trauels of some Noblemen preuailed on either part.

(16) The French King, thus ouer-busie about Scotland, was ouercarelesse of his own, when (at solemnizing the marriages of his daughter and sister) hee would needs be a Challenger at Tilt, seconded by the Duke of Guise & Ferrars, which triumphant ioy, was suddenly clouded with a sad Catastrophe. For to render his last (and indeed his last) course in fauour of his Queene, he sent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery, with a command to haue him enter the Tilt; but hee excusing himselfe from running against this Malefite, alleged, that fortune the day before, afforded him not to breake one staffe, and that now (as he feared) she would put him to a second flame; but the King, destiny so enforcing, and his date fully runne, sent him a second command, which Montgomery very vnwillingly obeyed, and breaking his Lance vpon the Kings Cuirasse, a splinter thereof, his Beauer being somewhat open, broke him so deepe in the eie, that thereupon shortly he ended his life.

(17) After whose death, Francis his sonne, and second of that name, at the age of fixtene yeeres succeeded him in the Crowne of France; hauing by the marriage of Queene Marie, the Title of Scotland annexed to his others. He hearing of the troubles raised there, in case of Religion, sent Monsieur de la Broche to strengthen the Field, and the Bishop of Ameans to assist the Queene Regent, with his farre reaching and inforcing counsell. Surely the preparation to withstand them was great, and the combinations many that stood for Reformation, as namely, one Duke, fourtene Earles, and eleuen Lords, besides other of name and account; but knowing their Aduersaries forces, and seeing those strangers to possesse diuers of their Townes and Forts, to the oppressing of the Kingdome vnder forraigne subiectio, they were enforced to become Petitioners vnto Queene Elizabeth, for aide to expell the French, who fought the subseruion of the Realmes state.

(18) The Magnanimous Queene, nothing fearing the threats of that potent Nation, nor liking such neighbours as formerly professed to rob her of her right, and now vnder pretence of suppressing the Scots, were not vnlikly to attempt an inuasion vpon her Realme; (for so the Almanes hired by the French were told they should doe) gaue them aideistance vpon Articles assured; whereof one was, that they should hold faithfull concurrence with England during the life of the French King, and one yeere after. For the performance whereof, sixe young Gentlemen were sent into England; and the Duke of Norfolke into the North, who from Barwicke dispatched the Lord Gray of Wilton for General into Scotland, accompanied with many worthy Captaines, fixe thousand foot, and one thousand two hundred and fifty horsemen; these comming to Salt-Preston were were loyfully receiued of the Scottish Lords, who therein in Councell decreed what was to be done.

(19) From thence they marched toward Lesle-rike, where a Trumpet from the Queene Regent met them with a safe conduct for Sir James Croft, and for Sir George Howard, with fixe other Gentlemen to accompany them vnto her presence in the Castell of Edenborough; vnto which the General and the Scottish Lords agreed, with an abstinence from Armes during the conference. But the French (the meane while) vnder the command of Monsieur Dolsell issued forth of Leith, and in good array took the field, which when the Lord Gray perceived, he sent an Harold vnto them, willing them to depart till the English were returned, according to the order betwixt their Regent and him; but they returned him answer, they were on their Mistresses ground, which they meant to make good, and thereupon discharged a whole volley of shot vpon the English Army.

(20) The Allarum thus giuen when least it was expected, a cruell skirmish beganne, wherein diest of the French about seauen score persons, the rest were enforced backe into Leith, and many of the English both hurt and slaine. Whereupon they intrenched the Crag, and planted their Ordinance against Leith, vpon whose Steeples the French had mounted their great Canons, whence their Bullets flew aaine; and ere long a bold attempt was undertaken by them, who with fiftie horsemen and five hundred Harquebussiers issued out of Leith, and assailed the English new trenches with such valour, as they entered, & a while possessed the same; where they tooke Maurice Berkeley prisoner, wonne his ensigne, cloyed the touch-holes of three great peeces, and slew no small numbers of their resisters.

(21) The English by this time had armed themselves (for this assault was vnexpectedly giuen) and Captaine Vaughan with his, brauely entered the Trench, who being seconded by Captaine Somerfort, Reade, and Arthur Grey, recovered the same with some slaughter of men, the Ordinance from Leith discharging vpon them to the great annoyance of their honourable seruice; and now being Masters of what was late lost, they cleared the great Ordinance which the French had stopped, and cast a new Trench along by the old Chappell, whence with their great Peeces they beate downe the Steeples of Saint Anthony and Saint Nicholas in Leith, and dismounted the Peeces that therein lay leuelled against them.

(22) In the full course of which disentions, the Queene mother, Regent of Scotland (a Lady of excellent endowments of minde) consumed with thoughts, displeasures and Melancholy, departed this life in Edenborough Castell: the Lords waxing stronger, and Leith much weaker through extremity of famine, and the French King, (the onely pillar on whom their strength did consist) not able to assist them. Who being brought daily into feares through new tumults arising, and increased in his owne Country of Ambosie, was forced (saith Leslie) to yield vp all the Dominions, both of France, and of Scotland, vnto Pope Pius the fourth, to be at his command and defence; but his Holinesse fearing his owne tottering estate, like a wise man, that meant to warpe no more then he could well weare, suffered king Francis to seek for other redresse, which hee did from her, that was more willing and better able to giue him content.

(23) For sending his Ambassadors vnto Queene Elizabeth, whose noble spirit himselfe had first provoked, desired her peace to be had with Scotland, & that Commissioners might be appointed to meet with his in that Realme; alledging that it was vnfitting to a Soueraigne to sue to his Subiects, as hee was ouer them by his marriage with their onely Queene. Her princely mind euer forward to assist the afflicted, and now desirous to saue Christian blood, dispatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecil her Principall Secretary, with Doctor Wotton Deane of Canterbury, one of her sacred Councell, eminent for his singular prudence, and formerly employed vpon like affaires in France.

(24) These falling in conference concluded finally vpon certaine Articles, whereof those that concerned England were these: That neither the King of France nor his Queene of Scotland, should thenceforth vs the Armes or titles of England or Ireland, and that all letters sealed with those Armes should be called in within fixe monethes space; that both the English and French should depart Scotland, some few excepted, employed vpon occasions; and that a generall pardon should be enacted by Parliament concerning all such as had bene in these stirres. Which Parliament was assembled at Edenborough in August following. These things accomplished, an Ambassage of thanks was solemnly addressed vnto Queene Elizabeth by the Earles of Morton, Glencarne, and the young Laird of Leithington, with proffer that the Earle of Arran, the greatest Lord in account among them, should be at her disposal for marriage, which (as they well hoped) would be to her selfe.

(25) With the like concealed hope the yeere before, John Duke of Finland, second sonne to Gustabus King of Sweden, was sent to her by his father, to treat a marriage for his elder brother Erius, who was most honourably entertained, but dismissed without all hope of his suite. Notwithstanding, Gustabus being dead, Erius now reigning King of Sweden, hauing imprisoned his brother John, solicited her Maiesty the second time, but to his dishonour as it fell out, for his suite recited in the English Court, hee attempted to match with the youngest daughter of Philip Langraue of Halia, who hearing that hee had twice receiued denial in England, denied him also with some disgrace, giuing his daughter vnto Adolfe Duke of Holst, vncle vnto Fredericke King of Denmark, at that time enemy to Erius.

(26) The Peace scarcely was concluded betwixt England and France, when Francis the young King was taken away by death, and another pupill King crowned, euen Charles his younger brother, and ninth of that name, who was guided altogether by the Regency of the Queene mother, and molested with the ciuill disentions betwixt those Princes of Guize and Conde. For whose reconciliation Queene Elizabeth sent Sir Henry Sidney Lord President of Wales, vnto which her endeauours, howsoever the French gaue countenance in Court, yet on the Seas they tooke her Merchants shippes, imprisoned the men, and seized their goods, no other cause alleged but that they were Hugonots.

(27) These misdemeanors, Englands great Queen tooke not well; yet did shee not so much blame, as pity the young and ouerruled King, brought to such a fraight, that hee was neither able to defend the authority of his owne lawes, nor to uphold the leagues made with other Princes. But most especially the cause of Religion (the onely pretended motive of all these disturbances) together with the solicitations of the French themselves (as from Roan, Deip and Newhauen) moued her Maiesty first to set forth her greouances publicly in print, and next to send aide vnto Monieur Vidame Captaine of Newhauen, against such as sought to subuert both religion and the Estate.

(28) These landing in Normandy were with great ioy receiued into the Townes of Newhauen, Roan, and Deip, which were willingly surrendered into the English Queenes possession (the onely Cloud-pillar that stood betwixt Gods cholen Israel, & the bloud-seeking Amalekites in this wilderness of Sins), with this reclamation by the Queene her selfe interted, no way to preiudice the Kings Soueraigne authority, nor the estate of the Realme; so vpright was she, notwithstanding their late vniust intruding vpon her right and title.

title; and her owne iust and ancient title to those forraigne parts, and especially to Normandy.

(29) The Generall of these English so sent, was the Lord Ambrose Dudley Earle of Warwicke, who following his charge before gone to Seas, arrived at Newhaufen the nine and twentieth of October, where his Commission was proclaimed, and oath taken, vnto whom strengths of Scottish men were sent him from Diepe, whereof Monsieur Montgomery was presently made Gouernour, hauing loft Roa vnto the King of Navarre, though the vnfortunate King bought the victory with his owne death, as he viewed the weaker parts of the City.

(30) To withstand the English thus settled in Normandy, the Conce Reingraue was sent, and in familiar conference told the Earle of Warwicke, that he was come to bee his neighbour; but proued indeed so couetous an encrocher, as lastly he dispossessed the Earle of the Towne. For albeit that many manly feates were therein performed by the English, and the place stored with prizes of wines, yet wanting fresh victuall, but especially fresh water, which the enemy had cut off, the calamities were great, and much more augmented by a contagious pestilence that flew many more the did either famine or sword; so that the English hauing posselt the Towne for eleuen monethes space, now were constrained to surrender it vpon composition, bringing thence many sickle foulders that dangerously infected England with a long continuing plague.

(31) Times motion in England now moued only with the benefite of peace, and no act memorable to commit vnto history; let vs supply this Interim with looking a little into the state of Religion in France; as wee haue scene, and somewhat touched the proceedings thereof both in England and Scotland. The Gospell spreading farre in that faire Continent, the impugners tooke occasions to raise many fires, and all in shew to race out new heresies as they accused & called the reformed doctrine. For which cause the French Townes burning in the flames of seditions, the Protestants blood was thought fittest to quench them, & the rapines committed vpon chaste wives and virgines, was pretended to bee canceled by a marriage wrought and contracted betwixt two Princes of the blood: which were Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Navarre, a fauourer of the Gospell, and Margarete de Valois the third daughter of King Henry the second, and sister vnto King Charles now reigning, a Princeesse much deuoted to the Romish Religion. These must bee the Birds to bring others to the Net, and one of them laid for, to bee caught in the same snare.

(32) This match was plotted by the Marshall of Coffe, and the Master of Requests, with the deuise no doubt of some in higher place, who wrought the Queene of Navarre, vnder the pretence of great affection, that the French King bare vnto her; and the Chastillon Admirall (a most zealous Protestant) vnder an intent of employment for the defence of the Low Countries, against the King of Spain. This match indeed seemed to confirme a publicke concord, only the Popes dispensation must bee had by reason of pretended consanguinity of the parties, the one being petty Nephew, the other grand-child of Francis the first King of France. And the Queene of Navarre made some scruple of the Ceremonies for the celebration, place and Church; but ciuill reason ouerwaying all difficulties, the Theater must bee Paris, as the Capitall City, and the marriage acted without any change of Ceremony, or of royall forme.

(33) Chastillon the Admirall was formeost at Court, where the Papales gaue him place, and to take from him all ialousie or mistrust, the King countenanced him so much, that hee repayed his losses sustained in the warre, grants him the reuenues of his brother the Cardinall Chastillon, that lately fled and dyed in England, treats with him familiarly, giues him a place in his Priuy Councell, and euer honours him with the plausible name of Father; inasmuch as the people beganne to murmur that King Charles not only fauoured the Huguenots, but was now become a Huguenot himselfe. And the Admirall for his part thinking all vpbright, to that end moueth the King to treat a peace with the Queene of England to the prejudice of the Spaniards: with these motives among others, that Elizabeth was vnmarried, and Henry Duke of Anjou had no wife, the dignity of so high an alliance was honourable for the Duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by the Queene, he hauing in his yong yeeres purchased great honour and reputation.

(34) The charge of this message was committed to Marshall Montmorency, both to haue his absence at Court, the better to worke what was intended, & to stay her Maiesty by vertue of that peace, from attempting any thing against France, in fauour of the Protestants. The foord thus sounded by the well meaning Admirall, seemed the more safely passable: for the two Queenes of England and Navarre, the first of them granting the Peace so desired, and the other without all ialousie repaired to the French Court; where eightene dayes after her arriual, of a quotidian feuer she died, though others saide not without suspicion of poyson by the perfume of a paire of Gloues presented vnto her.

(35) Soone after, the marriage was solemnized vpon a high Scaffold, built before the Church dore of our Lady in Paris; and foure dayes spent in plaies, feasts, dancing and Maskes: all which were but traines and introductions vnto what was intended: for the Admirall departing the Kings presence with all complements of amity, as hee passed from the Louure, and in reading a Petition, was with a Harquebuss leuelled out of a window, shot into the left arme, and dangerously hurt. At which traitorous attempt the King and Queene-mother seemed to bee greatly perplexed, visiting him with all expedition, and for his further safety commanded all his fauourers (the Protestants) to bee lodged nere about him. But the night now approached, Coffines brake into his Bed-Chamber, and three of his Company entering his Bed-chamber, with their weapons barbarously murdered him, whose goared body at Guizes command, they cast out of the Window, Guize himself wiping the blood from his face, acknowledged him to be the man. His head they cut off, and presented to the Queene-mother, and free balming it, sent it to her Holy Father for an assurance of the death of his most capital enemy.

(36) The Pallace Clocke strikes (the Watchword vnto the Alarm) when the other armed troupes flie to the Admiralls lodging, cut off his hands, dragge his martyred Carcase through the streets, and lastly hang it vp by the feet at Montfaucon. And with the like hellish fury the bloody faction oppressed the Protestants, both in the City & Suburbs, sparing neither sexe, condition, nor age through whose streetes nothing was heard but gasty horror, armes, horses and death, with the pitifull shriekings of the Innocents, crying (but alas in vain) for mercy. On the other side, the shouders of the murderers preailed, saying, that this one day shold end the quarrell, which neither penne, paper, decrees of Iustice, nor open warre for twelue yeeres together could euer doe. Lamentable was the spectacle of those sacred and massacred carcases flew in the streetes, the pauements, market-places and riuers dyed with their blood, and that Saboth made direfull, and to the Papists infamous, with the bloody pollution of often thousand Innocents, in the faine whereof we will leaue them, and returne our stile againe for England.

(37) As these ciuill seditions were on foot in other parts, so Ireland too too rebellious, fought vnder the shelter of Shan O Neale, to throwe themselves from the obedience of Queene Elizabeths government,

Irish Rebellion
vnder Shan O Neale
his, John O Neale

ment; a man cruell by nature, and claiming an inhe-ritary right of the Prouince of Ylster, as the O Neales formerly had done of all Ireland. For in the trouble-some times of Robert Brus, when his brother Edward named himselfe King of Ireland, Donnald O Neale, rowled out of his lurking holes, in his misliue letters vnto the Poppe, stileth himselfe King of Ylster, and in right of inheritance the vndoubted heire of all Ireland. But his glorious shew being clouded before it was scene, his posterity pult in their hornes like snailles, vntill the firebrandes of Ciuill dissensions betwixt the Houses of Lancaster and York, gaue light to their footing, whilest the English left Ylster vnto their custody, and followed in England the faction which they best fauoured.

(38) At which time, Henrie O Neale, began to be great by marrying the daughter of Thomas Earle of Kildare; as afterward also his sonne * Con-More O Neale, married the daughter of Girald Kildare (his mothers brother) both of those Kildares being Deputies of Ireland. From thebed of these Cosen-germanes, issued Con O Neale, surnamed Bacco, because he halted; who was so right Ylster, that hee curled all his posterity, in case they either learned the English language, sowed wheate, or built them houses, least the first shold breed conuersion, the second Commerce of sustenance, and with the last they shold speede as the Crowe that buildeth her nest to bee beaten out by the Hawke.

(39) But King Henry the eight, with whom was no dallying, setting his tallant fast on Kildare, in whose rebellions O Neale had engaged himselfe deepe, so ouer-dares this enuying Irish bird, that hee flies into England, sues to the Eagle, renounceth the name of O Neale, and puts his whole estate into the Kings hand. Whose humble submission so satisfied this crowned bird, that his life was deliuered out of his claw, and letters Patents granted vnder the Great Seale of England, to hold his reuenues in Fee of the King, together with the Title of Earle of Tir-Oen, to him and to Mathew his false reputed son, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten, at what time the said Mathew was created Baron of Dungannon.

(40) Shan O Neale (with whom wee began) the eldest legitimate vnto this Con-Bacco, seeing himselfe disherited, and a bastard preferred before him, suddenly set his heart against his father, as also against Mathew his high honoured and halfe-reputed brother, whom hee neuer left till hee had murdered, and pursued his father with such irreconcilable hatred, as hee stript him out of house and all, and neuer left, till for want and griefe, the olde man pined away.

(41) Shan then chosen proclaimed, and inaugurated O Neale, by an old shooe cast ouer his head, seized vpon his fathers inheritance, and with all diligence sought after the sonnes of Mathew, to secure himselfe of that which hee had got. Brian the eldest hecaused to be slaine by Mac Donnell Totan, one of the O Neales race, but Hugh and Cormack by meanes of the English escaped his hands. Thus fortified in Ylster hee beganne to tyrannize ouer the great men of that prouince, accounting them his Subiects, as in his answeres vnto the English Iusticiar, expostulating with him vpon that point, hee laid his Title.

(42) That hee was the vndoubted sonne and heire of Con-Oneale, borne of his lawful wife; and that Mathew his supposed brother, was the sonne of a Blacke-smith borne in Dundalke, and vnto the age of fifteene yeeres had bene so reputed and taken, that then hee was obtruded vpon Con, by the said Smiths wife, whom hee had formerly kept for his Concubine, with an intent to interuert the inheritance and honour of the O Neale another way. That his surrender vnto King Henrie of England, was of no validity, considering that Con had no longer therein then his owne life, neither could that lawfully bee done without the consent of the Nobles of Ylster, by whom hee had beene elected O Neale. That himselfe was by Law both of God and man, the onely true heire, being the first begotten sonne of his father, lawfully borne in Wedlocke, chosen, declared and proclaimed O Neale, by the generall consent of the Peeres and People of Ylster, and that according to the ancient law Tanistry, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a boy, and an vnkle before a nephew, whose Grandfather suruiued the father, and lastly, that hee had done nothing, but what hee had sufficient authority to doe, and which his ancestors had not vied before him to doe.

(43) His title thus pleaded and passed without opposition, hee presently fell into other outrages; for O Raylie hee ouerthrew in the Field, tooke Cai-ligh O Donel Lord of Tir-Comel captiue, cast him and his children in prison, carried away his wife, and in adultery begat bastards vpon her, seizing vpon lands and goods at his pleasure, and bare himselfe as absolute King of Ylster.

(44) These his doings Thomas Earle of Suffex (the Lord Deputie) fought to redresse, whose preparations so strangely terrified him, that by the counsell of Girald Earle of Kildare, hee came into England, and cast himselfe prostrate at Queene Elizabeths feet, and vpon his submissive behaviour and promised allegiance, with her gracious fauour returned home; where for a while in his diet and apparell, hee conformed himselfe to all kind of ciuility, yea and did some office of seruice in driving the Scots out of Ylster, slaying their leader Mac-Comel, and in protecting the poorer sort from the violence and oppressions of the Nobles. In which his doings hee drew vpon himselfe their hatreds and complaints; and hee whole nature could digest neither, fell furious for reuenge vpon Mac-Guir, Lord of Fermanagh, fired Armagh the Metropolitane City, laid siege vnto Dundalke, and harried the Countrey on euery side.

(45) Against whom Sir Henrie Sidney, then Deputy of Ireland, came in person himselfe into the Field; and Edward Randolph, a renowned Coronell, with seuen Ensignes of Foot, and a Corner of Horse-men, encamped at Derry by Lough Rell, that so hee might charge the backe of the Rebell; which O Neale well perceiving, halted with his forces to remouue: where Randolph in a pitch field entred battell, and there manfully fighting with honour, lost his life, but gaue the O Neale so great an ouerthrow, as neuer after hee was able to make Head against his Soueraign, and in many other Skirmishes was so foiled, as hee evidently saw his owne dreadfull downfall. Wherefore hee minded once more to sue for the Queenes mercy, and with a halter about his necke, intended to humble himselfe to the Lord Deputy, for his fauour and mediation vnto her Maiesty.

(46) But making Neale Mackeuer (his Secretary) secret to thefe his designs, was by him counselled to try fortunes fauour yet another way; the occasion well fitting, and the persons of great hope (if hee could fasten amity with them) which were the wilde Scots, who held their standing Summer-Campe in Claneboy, vnder the conduct of two Brethren, Alexander Oge, and Mac Gillaspie, whose father and brother this Shan O Neale had lately slaine, in an ouerthrow giuen to the Scots. For the furer gaining of whose fauour, hee sent before hand Surley-boy, Alexanders brother, whom hee had taken and reueined prisoner a long time, and soone after, himself with the wife of O Donel (whom adulterously hee kept) repaireing vnto them was kindly welcomed and intertained in a Tent; where after their Cups, they fell to a brawle about James Mac-Comel, (Alexanders brother) whom Shan had slaine, as also about the honesty of his sister, whom hee had married and cast off, for the loue hee bare vnto O Donels wife. Whereupon after a signal giuen, in heat of reuenge, Alexander and his brother with many wounds hacked Shan O Neale to death, a few of his followers escaping their swords by flight; by whose death Ylster recovered their wished peace, after after a greuous distature of oppression and warres, in which let vs a while leaue them, and returne to the affaires of England.

(47) The time now expired for retention of Callis so forthright after, and so thirthingly kept; Queene Elizabeth presently sent vnto Charles the French King, to demand the deliuey according to covenants. He set in estate, accompanied with the Queene mother and others, the English Embassadors had audience, and the Title controuersed among them as followeth. The Queenes Letters read and attendance giuen what would more be said: Sir Thomas Smith (for he was the man) demanded in her Maiesties name, the Towne of Callis, the Forts, and other the appurtenances, the Cattle and Towne of Guize, and generally all such Cattles, Townes, and places as had bene taken by his Father Henry, the late French King in his last warres, from Marie late Queene of England, her Maiesties sister: which in a Treatie of peace made at Casseau in Cbrest the yeere of Christ, 1559. was agreed vpon, that his Soueraigne, Queene Elizabeth should permit the said French King and his successors to possesse, and peaceably to enioy the said Townes, Cattles, and places, the space of 8. yeeres, and those expired the said K. Henry covenanted for himselfe and Successors to deliuer the same intirely vnto the English, which being compleat and ended the second of that present moneth April, himselfe with Sir Henry Norris her Maiesties Ambassador vpon the third day of the same month demanded in her name the possession thereof accordingly, but could not attaine or get speech, either with Lieutenant or Gouverneur. Whereupon they were enforced to make repaire to his maiesty, whom hee doubted not but would accomplish the performance, and likewise keepe perpetuall amity with his Soueraigne Lady and Mistresse.

(48) King Charles but young, and altogether gouerned by the Queene-mother, hauing well learned his lesson, made present answer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereunto but himselfe, neither should any deliuer it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the English Ambassador, did wholly giue it him. Whereunto Sir Thomas replied, That neither her Maiesty nor Council did so take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being so plain and manifest. Why, Master Smith, quoth the Queene-mother, I maruell the Queene your Mistresse would now send for such a purpose, and especially you, who knoweth none better, how all things haue passed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Callis, and all her rights in those places diuers waies. As first, by invading the Kings Subjects in Scotland, then most manifestly at New-hauen, where the King, my sonne, wasaine with an whole Army to recover it: and in the said Treaty was an Article as hath bene disposed; that if the Queene of England should invade any part of my sonnes Dominions, she should forthwith lose her right in Callis.

(49) Madame, said Sir Thomas: King Henrie and his successors were bound to lose Callis, if they invaded England, and yet did King Francis brother to the King here, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is most manifest, after the said Treaty at Casseau, not onely in assuming the Armes and Title of England and Ireland, but contrary to the Article of Peace, which concluded that both English and French should depart Scotland: which inconueniently her Maiesty performed, in reuoking thence her Lieutenant, Captaines, and Souldiers: whereas contrariwise Monsieur D'oisell their Chiefeaine abode therein still, and the French power daily augmented vnder the conduct of Monsieur de Martignes, and de la Brosse, and also by an other great Commander, whose Naue was dispersed by tempest, and whose strength his shipwracke did testifie, in Holland, Zealand, Norway and Denmarke, by the losse of Armour, Men and Munition: to let passe Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to invade England; and Lanzknights likewise hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lunenburg to assit the French in that enterprise, when these Almans according to their nature loth to take Seas, and desirous to know whether their seruice intended, were told, they should no further then Scotland, and to the Land adioyning, which was plentifull of gold, siluer, and all kind of wealth, and where no Almane Souldier had made spoile for the space of an hundred yeeres before, and to some of them in plain termes it was told, that they should into England; which was likewise signified vnto her Maiesty, both from her neighbour Princes, warning her highnesse to take good heede vnto her selfe; as also by letters intercepted, that declared their intents; whereof thece did not onely admonish Monsieur de Seure then Ambassador in England for France; but also by her Ambassador to the French King, praying him to desist from such attempts so prejudiciall to her Highnesse, and so directly against the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter the said de Seure made a Protestation in print, the answer whereunto is likewise printed in English, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein may appeare the History of that time. And since her Maiesty hath had a more manifest prooffe by men which are yet aliue. For when the most part of the French power was arrived in Scotland, the Queene Mother, Monsieur de Oisell, and Monsieur de Martignes called the Scottish Lords with their Forces vnto Al-mouth besides Barwick; where they declared that their minde was to invade England; and to giue to the King and Queene the possession of the English Crowne; of which they now had the Titles and Armoies. But the Lords of Scotland vpon consultation, made answer, That they had often attempted to invade England, but they neuer got any good thereby; further affirming, it was against the peace newly concluded and sworn: so neere was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of peace at Edenborough, wherein the numbers of French Souldiers were to be lessened; the Stile and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Casseau renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commissioners, authorized by the French King vnder his Great Seale: which treaty when it was signed with all the Commissioners hands, the Queene my Soueraigne for the loue of peace being contented to seale and swear, the said King Francis did refuse the both, with which refusal her Maiesty doth, and hath alwaies taken that the right of Callis both propriety and possession was deuolued vnto her by reason of the attempt, and hath demanded it diuers times, yet was content to stay the time of composition; which now being clearly expired, it must needs bee hers, and cannot iustly be denied.

(50) Why (said the Queene) all this while you haue said nothing against the King my sonne, why he should forsake it; hee hath done nothing: and is the bearing of your Armes so great a matter with you? you beare the Arms and stile of ours, so do demany, beare others Armes also. No Madame said Sir Thomas Smith, the bearing of the Armes is not so great a matter, but that with other things doe declare the intent, and the attempt maketh the right forfeited by the treaty. And though the King your sonne did not forfeit it, yet the right being once lost from France, and accrewed to the Queene of England, how should it goe from her again? All this while (said the Queene Mother) you speake but of the King of Scotland, who did it in his wifes right, and there you must aske your amends, and not here, you beare what my sonne saith, and euery man seeth the right is his, your Queene hath forfeited it, and therefore I maruell my good sister will stand in it, or send to demand it. This is the answer said Sir Thomas which I shal carry to the Queene my Soueraigne. That Nay, said the King, I will take with my Council, and then shall you haue a resolute answer. Then were the English Ambassadors desired to absent themselves a while, and within an howre after were sent for againe.

The cause for Callis debated before the French King and his Council.

(51) The King set in Council with the Queene Mother, the Dukes of Anjou, Alençon, Montpencier, Amale, and Neuers, the Cardinals of Bourbon and Chastillon, the Bishops of Orkane and Lymoges, Monsieur de Valence and others, the Ambassadors of England were placed in the middle: vnto whom the Queene spake and said, Monsieur L' Ambassadeur I pray you say your minde before the King and his Council here assembled: which Sir Thomas Smith presently did in the same forme as hee had done before, adding with all, that this demand was grounded vpon the lapse of the time, by which without all controuersie after eight yeeres Callis was due to the Queene of England, and that by right, both the propriety, and the possession thereof was inuested vnto her long ago, by the forfeiture made by the attempt in Scotland, by the commandement and consent of Francis the second to invade England, seeing the King did not ratifie the treatie made at Edenborough.

(52) Monsieur de Valence said the Queene Mother, I pray you answer that, whereupon he standing vp saide, my selfe was sent to that treaty of peace, and am glad to heare Monsieur L' Ambassadeur confesse that the bearing of the English Armoies was but a small matter, & yet was that the chiefe thing imputed by their side, as for the men of warre, they were not above five thousand at the most, sent indeed because of a rebellion (for so must I learne it in plaine termes) then risen there. But the English men were about fifteen thousand that came against them at Petty-Lith. There was sent thither also the Bisshope of Amiens with the Popes Bulles, to reduce them againe to the Religion Romaine. And as touching these matters I spake with your Queene as I came through England, and offered her as much at the first as was done in that Treaty, if shee would breake the League betwixt her and the Scottish Lords, which were Rebels. But shee said shee could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was signed with my hand and others: there should haue come into France certain Scottish Lords to haue agreede and sworn to certain Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was sore sick, and could not attend them, who shortly after died, and so the Treaty was not ratified. And he being dead the King that now is, had nothing to doe to ratifie it: for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queenes doings and titles, which appertained nothing at all vnto him.

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and said, I am not ignorant that the Article saith, Armis innouare, attentare aut moliri, and doe not take Armis to signifie Armoies. But the Armes that I meant to weigh the most, and the attempt with them done was the Armed men, and the good Captaines whom I named D'Oisell, Brosse, Martignes, and others, their Ensignes and Companies, marry the Armoies and Titles did disclofe the intent and meaning. And if there had bene none other but them which the Bishop brought, and none other munition but the Popes Bulles, Queene Elizabeth should not haue needed to haue armed so many shippes, nor sent so many Souldiers to haue let their enterprise, nor would cuer haue complained of it: but it was farre otherwise as I haue declared. As for the league you speake of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the cunct did shew what Rebels they were. But this I thinke they were weary to haue so many of youthere, as wee were weary to haue you so neere vs. And therein I thinke the Queenes Maiesty and they did agree. And to excuse the refuse of the ratification, by the not comming in of the Scottish Lords, hath small reason to beare it: for the Treaty made betwixt the French King then, and the Queene of England might haue been ratified notwithstanding, whatsoeuer was betwixt him and the Scottish Lords his Subjects: for our fact and peace did not stand vpon their doings; which Treaty because it was not ratified, I say, the Queene my Soueraignes title to the possession of Callis, by reason of that attempt standeth whole and entire vnto her.

But sir said he (speaking to the King) to say the truth I haue no commission, nor any commandement or authority to dispute or answer in these matters, but onely to demand Callis and the other fortresses, and places according to the Treaty, which is so plain; that to mine opinion there neede bee no controuersie. And if there bee any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. But because you and the Queene haue charged mee that I know so much of the matter, as I cannot deny somewhat I doe, as hauing bene at the doing of a great deale & the dispute: Somewhat I must, and may say for my selfe, lest it should bee thought that there were nothing to be said. Marry as I said, as Commissioner from the Queene my Soueraigne, I haue nothing to say, but the demands onely, the matter being plain and in right iudgement, without controuersie, and also that I see no person here but such as be parties, and no competent person to bee iudge of the controuersie. Whereunto the Constable replied and saide, Who should bee iudge of that which is the Kings but himselfe? it is his, and none could take or giue it to any other but himselfe: with that the Queene mother asked Monsieur Chancelier, why hee did not speake.

(54) Who after some pause became a long and well composed oration, the sum whereof was this; That the present Kings right to Callis was long before any claime could be made thereunto by the English, which was not much about two hundred yeeres, and then was it got by the fortune of warre; but more anciently, that it had bene the inheritance of France none can deny, as being vpon the Continent thereof, and not vpon any English ground. King Edward (quoth he) wee grant want, and your father noble King reuante it to his Crown. But the English will say they haue possessed and enioyed it many yeeres: Why so they did Aquitaine, Gascoigne, and Guyen, and other dominions besides, which they claimed by our Elionor, the repudiate of the King of France, who was inheritrix vnto it: indeed some titles they had, yet so as they held them of the Crowne of France: for the whole which is Gallia appertained to you for our King: and so doth Callis which is of no great antiquity that I careuod of: for Countie Boloigne was the first that did inclose it, being afore but a Burgard, as the most part of the Townes of France then were. At the battell of Cressy, dolorous to vs, King Edward of England after nine monethes siege by composition had it surrendered, the poor inhabitants pardoned of life at the great suit of his good Queene, else had they died euery mothers sonne, and so with white wounds in their hands were expelled the towne: To whom the King of France was so merciful, that hee commanded of euery thing waicant, they should bee the first provided for. And I thinke when your Father King Henry tooke it, the English were likewise so serued. These claime two hundred yeeres possession, the others before them, about five hundred yeeres: thus God doth to punish, or to essay his seruants. And although the English claimed Gascoigne, and Guyen, by succession of Elionor, although Normandy by one William, and P'outieure by a Dowry of their mother, daughter of Philip de Bel. Yet to Callis they had no right, but onely by Armes, and by Armes your Father againe recovered it. But some will say, by the peace at Breigny, they haue right; I say no, for euery man knowes what exceptions were taken at that peace: and some, that so long a possession makes a prescription, I say no, for prescription is among priuate men, but among Princes prescription cannot stand, and yet theirs was not much about two hundred, ours about eight hundred yeeres. But to you Monsieur L' Ambassadeur, I will say, that at the peace of Troyes in Champaign, were your selfe and Monsieur Throgmorton, both of you most able in such affairs, and nothing therein done I doubt not without the Queen and Counsels consent: no one word was spoken of Callis, which chiefly was the cause of the warres, so that all standeth clear for at which was then talked vpon, and is a plain confession, that they did acquit their right thereunto. This Article I say is translatiue in the peace of Casseau in Cambresis, and is no more but such as forgeselfe, or because all small things cannot be mentioned in conference. But Callis was the chiefe point, which being omitted, I say by meaning it was acquited. But now to your reasons Monsieur L' Ambassadeur, the Article for the losse of Callis at that treaty was forced in by you the English, who of all nations bee the most wary and circumspect in making their peaces. Whereupon the Queene of England layeth to us a supposition, a zealousie, a conjecture, a gesse, that a King of France would have invaded England. But every supposition must not make a breake: for so whensoever any Prince should arme his men upon such occasion, his neighbours might say it was against him: And so doe you English lay gesses against the late King Francis the second. But the Queene of England with open face invaded the Kings Realme, with a goodly pretence to keepe the townes to the Kings use, yet when alwas reduced into their due obedience, she would keep the town of Newhaven as a pledge for Callis, by which deed she hath lost all her right in Callis, God indeed hath made a naturall separation betwixt you and us, a sure wall of defence, Et penitus toto divisijs orbis Britannos. So that naturally you ought to have nothing but peace and amity with ours. But doe not thinke Monsieur L' Ambassadeur that I say this as fearing what you can doe: for there was never any King of France since Charlemain so great as the King is now, had so many men of warre, so ready, and so good Soldiers: and yet his Highnesse doth desire the amity of the Queene of England, and the love of that nation: of which there is the more hope, if all the pretences and demands were cancelled, and Callis forgotten, which hath bene the continuall picket-quarrell betwixt these two Realmes. You never read Monsieur Smith, that the French ever invaded England, I speake it not to your dispraise which are English, but to your praise; yet this I thinke, had there not bene so easie a descent, so convenient a place, and so ready, for you to make warre here, yee would not (as I suppose) have come hither so often, and troubled our Country, nor the amity betwixt you and us: I dare boldly affirm and gage any thing, that the Queene of England shall gaine more by continuall peace with us, then shee shall doe by Callis, & therefore your Queene must leave off these demands and quarrels, and come to a perfect peace with us, which shall be more profitable for both the Realmes, and this I dare assure you, here is no Counsellor among us, that dare once open his mouth to render you Callis for my part I will not be one to moue or assent therunto. Nor I said the Constable, and so all the rest.

Antistrophe, and turneth a great deale better vpon you. For if because our talke was of our right to Callis, by reason of the attempt in Scotland, you of the forfeiture of it by reason of the descent to Newhaven, neither condiscending to other, and not concluding thereupon, wee did agree vpon that Peace. And if that Peace doth make nonationem, then the forfeiture of our right by keeping Newhaven, which you impute to vs is wiped away, nouated and cled by this Peace, and our right which was not yet in esse, & cuius dies nondum venit, remaineth still. So as it toucheth you rather then vs, and by this means haue you nothing to say against vs, but wee still our right against you. But the truth is, as Monsieur Le Connestable here can tell, who was part the occasion that wee came to it, for when this was contended, that Callis was already due vnto vs, you, that wee had forfeited it, so that wee could enter into no other Article of peace, why said you, haue not wee the wit to make a peace, and make no mention of Callis? neither to speake of it one way, nor other: your time is not yet come to ask it, let vs liue in peace in the meane while, and let each Prince haue right such as it is, referred; whereupon you Monsieur L' Ambassadeur were one of the first that came with vs, and you know what passed.

The French the cause that Callis was not mentioned in the peace

(56) Tea (saith he) but wee would neuer grant that it should be put in, that you should haue Callis: you say true (saith Sir Thomas) nor wee that the Queene Maestie should acquit it, nor the hostages neither. But in the end when it came to the Conclusion, as the Bishoppe of Orleans, and Monsieur Bourdin can tell, it was agreed that expressly the right bee referred, aswell to that, as to any other thing, not expresse there mentioned. omnes alie petitiones & demandes & similitur exceptiones & defensiones as apperech by the Treaty. And as touching Newhaven, Monsieur Chancellor, note in it two things. The one, the first entrie, the other, the keeping after the peace agreed vpon amongst your felices. As for the first entrie, I deny that our men of warre made any inuasion or came by force. But being requested and desired aide of a great number of Noblemen, and other who were in perill and danger. And whether did they like inuaders (I aske for all the time that they were not assailed) spoile any, or robbe any? no, they tooke not an henne or an egge, but they paid for it: I, if any complain I offer to pay it: This is no inuasion, nor no hostility: but the act of a friend, and at their requests and pursuits: whose doings sir, aswell for matter of Armes, as for other things done in that tumult, you haue declared by Edict to haue bene done a bon finet pour vostre service, which may truly bee said, for by their means and defence a great number of your good Subjects, aswell men as women, aswell Capitaines as Soldiers, of whom Monsieur le Chancelier did now boast, as of other not Soldiers, are saved now to doe you service: which else should haue bene a prey and spoile to them which sought but the ruine of halfe or third part at the least of your Realme. For the conservation of whom, yee in part may thank the Queen my Mistresse. And this for the first dicent of our men. Now where Monsieur Chancelier saith that the Queene my Mistresse changed her pretence, I still doe say shee kept her first protestation. That she would appropriate no Land, Towne, nor Fortresse of the Kings to her, nor shee did neuer claime Newhaven as hers, but comming peaceably into it, hauing bene at great charge and cost, it was both wilddome and reason all other being satisfied and content, shee should at the least haue some reason offered her in her right to Callis. And otherwise shee did not hold Newhaven, which thing was manifestly declared at Gallion, where Articles were drawn not vnreasonable, and the matter so farre forward that they were signed with my hand, and tarried but for power and Commission to affirme them. But the mortality and pestilence growing so great in Newhaven,

Newhaven, gaue too much aduantage, which was taken; and the reasonable dealings in this matter broke off, other meaning her Maestie had none.

(57) No said the Constable, what means such preparation, and provision? I cannot skill of things, but in that arie wherein I haue bene brought up and exercised all my life, I can skill a little. There was such a number of Horse barreasse for the carie: such a number of Artillery, such provisions of Gamons of Bacon, Cheefe and other things, and about five thousand men, that am I sure went out of it, besides all those that were dead: can you make me beleue that all this was for Newhaven alone? No Monsieur (saith he) I know what belongeth to a Towne of Warre. Tea, said another, and the Ships also that came: Nay said the Constable they came too late. Why, said the Queene-mother smiling, will you make us beleue that all that preparation was for Newhaven alone?

(58) Wilddome would, Madam, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, because the sea and winde doe not serue at all times, that there should be good store of all manner of provision. No, no (saith shee) there was a further meaning, but as you haue quitted Newhaven, so must you quit Callis, and let vs be friends; neuer talke more of these demands, nor of the sums of money for which yee had hostages. All is gone from you quite. Your Queene in comming to Newhaven hath quitted all. Shee must forget that matter cleane, and let vs be friends still. The King my sonne doth offer as much friendship as need to bee, but as for Callis yee must neuer speake of it. It is hard, Madame, said Sir Thomas Smith, for a man to forget his right, or not to remember a wrong offered. Nays no wrong, said shee, you haue heard what Monsieur Le Chancelier hath said, and what all these of my Iohnes Counsell doe say. Madame, (quoth he) it is for the most part scene that men be partiall in their owne causes, I doe assure you, that the Queene my Soueraigne doth thinke that shee hath as good right to Callis as to any Towne in England: and so doe all her Counsell: and whatsoeuer yee haue heard, I am able to say for her right euen out of hand, but they a great deale more. But Sir, quoth Sir Thomas, is this the finall answer I shall haue? Tea, said the King. That yee will not render Callis vnto her Maestie, according to the Treaty, nor pay the five hundred thousand Crowns which is for the peine.

(59) No said the King, I will keepe them both according to the Treaty: well then said Sir Thomas I haue no more to say, but to bring this report to her Maestie, which I shall be forrie to doe: and thereupon himselfe, and Sir Henrie Norris, rose vp to depart, doing their obeisance. But you take not your leave, Monsieur L' Ambassadeur for altogether said the Queene. Yes forth said Sir Thomas. Doe you intend to come no more at Court? No Madame, except the Kings Maestie doe command me. But I am sorry to carry this answer so precise, and that there is so little regard of the Queene my Soueraignes right. No right, said the Queen, for if there were any, the King my sonne, would be loth to offer her any wrong: yee haue heard all the reasons, I maruell that you will take vpon you, you that are learned, to defend so vnjust a cause. Ah Madame (saith he) I see well, it is true on your part, that men bee blinde in their owne causes and aduantages. Surely (quoth she) the Queene (my good sister) shall haue more aduantage thus as it is, then to demand Callis. And I pray you persuade her. I Madame, against her right? You must not say so, I pray you commend me hartly to the Queene, my good sister, and desire her to keepe the amity and love which is betwixt her and my sonne, and I shall bee ready to doe her what service or pleasure I can quoth the Queen and so said the King. Thus this conference ended, and Callis kept still by the French.

(60) Now as these distaures fell betwixt England and France, and these broken Coucnants ministred occasions to set each against others: So at the same time, the affaires of Scotland was carried with so violent a motion as set the Lords at dissensions, and the land in ciuill fedition; so as not onely outrages were committed vpon the best Subjects, but euen

vpon the vertuous King and Queene themselves, him they shamefully murdered in a most barbarous manner, and her they tooke prisoner, forced her to resigne gouernment, and lastly to flye into forraigne parts for succour. But knowing that this Subiect is to be writ with a faire more noble pen, and our extant relations from vnertaine and suspected reports; we will forseeke to intermeddle in the particulars of that Queenes affaires, excepting onely in such intercourses of State, as are wouen in ours, and cannot otherwise be auoided without maine of History; this onely in generall.

(61) Mary Queene of Scotland hauing imbarcked her selfe for France, where shee well hoped to finde many friends; by contrary winde (accompanied with sixeteene persons) landed at Warkinton in Cumberland, and from thence was conuied to Carlisle, to Bolton Castle, and lastly to the custody of the Earle of Shrewsburie. Whose troubles and misfortune, Elizabeth both pittied and sought to redresse; writing in her behalf vnto the Regent of Scotland, and blaming the Lords of the many wrongs done to their Queen, which indeede were intolerable to roiall authoritie, and such, as other Princes could not but seeke to redresse, and reuenge; notwithstanding such was the distaure of those distempered Lords, or the frownes of those fatall times, that in England the remained euer after during her life.

(62) As the ielousies grew great betwixt these two great Queenes, Elizabeth and Mary, by the working instruments of the Pope, and forraigne Princes; by the like means, were the like discontents bred and nourished in some of the greatest English Peeres, towards their Soueraigne, whose Peace, vnder pretext of Religion, they irreligiously disturbed. Among these, the first in ranke, time and disoliation, were the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmorland, who with Leonard Dacres, Neill, Norton, Tempeste, Danby, and others, purposed on the sudden to haue surprized the Earle of Suffex, the Queens Lieutenant of the North, in his house at Camood; but therein preuented, they were enforced to keepe secret their intents, till some fit occasion should chance to be ministred. They had in readinesse against their rising, certaine English Priests, Morton, and others, with Bulles and instruments of absolution, reconciliation, and taking of Oathes to the Pope and his doctrine, which was not so secretly done, but that Queene Elizabeths vigilant Counsellors had an inkling thereof.

(63) Thomas Percie, (to was Northumberlands Earle named) lying at his Castle of Topleffe in Yorkshire, had gone so farre in his intended purposes, as he could not returne; who being sent for vnto the Court, strooke a great amazement and sudden feare into the other conspirators hearts: and his own guilty minde was much more distracted, vpon notice that some forces were approaching for his apprehension; whereupon all affrighted, he rose from his bed, and caused the Bels to be rung in a most confused manner, so that the Townesmen raised, all sought to defend and follow him their chiefe Lord.

(64) The next thus broken before the birds could well flye, he departed to Branpeth, where hee met with Charles Newill Earle of Westmorland, and his following consorts; who ioining in Counsell, made no conscience to vndoe many true subiects, and innocent men: For abusing the Queenes name in their Proclamations and Commissions, they commanded the Countrey to follow them in Armes; sometimes pretending the safety of her Maesties person, in danger (they said) by Treasons in working; and sometimes in case of Conscience for restoring their former Religion, which if themselves should neglect, other forraigne Princes (said they) would doe, to the no little perill of the Realme.

(65) In this zeale they hasted to Durham, with as forward an intent as Ierobam did to Bethel, to set vp vp his golden Calues, where they rent and tare the Bible, in as great a contempt, as Ioachim did the rowle that Ieremy wrote: at Darlington they besprinkled their Host with holy water, for feare of spirits, and at Rippon heard Masse, to forward their Treason, with the assistance of that Propitiatory Sacrifice. Whence, with Banners displayed, they entered Borowbridge, old Norton being their Ancient, whose Ensigne was the Crosse, and five wounds of our Lord.

(66) From thence they went to Tadcaster, Wetherby, and Bramham Moore, where they mustered sixteene hundred Horsemen, and foure thousand footmen, intending therewith to march vnto York. But their mindes altering, they fell vpon Barnard's Castle, which after cleuen daies resistance, was yeelded vnto them: which fortunate entrance did soaninate their rebellious conceits, as that in their letters sent to their fauourers, they daigned their Soueraigne no better stile, then Elizabeth the late Queene, pretended Queene, and no Queene indeede: as likewise did the Countesse of Northumberland in her Letter sent vnto Stuckley, and * others of the faction, in far worse termes.

(67) These things diuulged, and their rebellious still going on, Proclamations came forth denouncing them Traitors to their Queene and Country; and the Lord Seroupe Warden of the West-Marches, with the assistance of the Earle of Cumberland, and other Gentlemen of the Country, kept the Castle of Carlisle, while Sir John Foster warden of the Middle-Marches, accompanied with Sir Henry Percy, exercised their manlie resistance against these proud Rebels.

(68) To withstand their still-growing outrage, Thomas Earle of Suffex (her Maiesties Lieutenant General of the North) gathered some forces; whose Lieutenant for the footmen was Edward Earle of Rutland, and for the Horsemen, was Henry Lord Hunston, Lord Warden of the East-Marches, William Lord Eure leading the reeward. These followed the enemy to North-Allerton, Crosbybridge, Akle, Durham, Newcastle and Hexam, euen close at their heeles; whose power was so weak, and purle so empty, (being defrauded of an hundred thousand Crowns, promised them by the Pope, to maintain the Rebellion) as that those Rebellious heads entered conference with Edward Dacres at Naworth, of their desperate estate, being both monileffe and powerless to withstand the puiffance of the Lord General, now on their backs, as also the Earles of Warwicke, and Lincolne, the Lords Ferrers, Willowbie, and Howard, approaching very neere them, euen at Borow-bridges. No other succour their consultations could pitch on, then by flight into Scotland, vnto those Lords that there stood out for the Romish.

(69) So the Night following they put it in practise, not bidding their intrapped traine once farewell, which as Sheepe without a Shepherd, stood gazing at their owne destructions, whilest Suffex surprized them without any resistance. Vpon whose ring-leaders, Iustice so seized, that at Durham died, by Marshall Law, an Alderman, a Priest, and sixtie fixe Constables; and in the Country for a great Circuit, a great number of such as were forward in the Action.

(70) Not warned by these successes (which vsually proue vnhappy, in such disloyall attempts) Leonard Dacres of Harley began to gather head againe; whose aduers were the more resolute, in reuenge of their friends executed; and women also became stout souldiers in quarrell of their husbands, all forward enough, and too forward to mischief. These vpon a More neere vnto Naworth, to impeach the Lord Hunston that made hitherward, had set downe their battell in a triangle forme, where they continued a long and most desperate conflict, but in the end were forced to giue backe, and Dacres to flee from his flaine, wounded, and scattered people, towards Scotland, the then-Refuge of Traiterous transgressors.

(71) Scotland thus harbouring those disloyall English, and their owne Lords diuided into seuerall factions, some of them sought to concale, and some to apprehend these guiley Earles; so that Westmorland, was shifted away into Flaunders, but Northumberland, taken by the Kent, and committed to Custody, was afterwards sent into England, where having bene attained by Parliament, vpon the twentie two of August was beheaded at Poynt: vsing liberty of speeches, in auowing the Pope Supremacy, denying subiection vnto his Soueraigne Queene, affirming the Realme to be in a Schisme, and her obedient Subjects no better then Hereticks. Charles Westmorland his consort, a person vterly wasted by loofenesse of life, euen by Gods iust iudgement, in the time of his Rebellion, was beheaded of children, and afterwards wandering in forraigne parts, had his body eaten with vlcers of lewde causes, as is most constantly reported. But from these temporal proceedings (being the Domesticke effects of a forraign cause) let vs a while behold the spirituall flourish of the Popes leaden Sword, vntheated at Rome, to enspirite and enflame such traitorous dispositions against England's Queene.

(72) Nicholas Maureton an Englishman, made Bishop by Pius Quintus, that Pontificall and furle Pope of Rome, who now hauing turned the key of his Consistorie, and set wide open the doores vnto the complaints of his Clergy, against those Christian Princes, that vrge subiection to their positue Lawes (a Note indeed ill founding in the eares of his sonnes) among others, this puppet Bishop, commenced a feined suite and plea against Queene Elizabeth, whom thereupon Pius (like a transcendent Iudge) deputed from all Princely authoritie, as one vncapable either of Crown, or Government, and with the curle of his impious mouth, sent forth his Bull to goate her Maiestie like to those of Nathan, that encompassed David; the tenour whereof (if the words corrupt not the aire, and the inke the eies of the beholders) shal stand for euer as a Pillar of Salt, and Monument of shame to that Man of Sinne; the transcript whereof, taken from the original it selfe, is as followeth.

The same in English.

The declaratorie sentence of the Vniuersall Bishop, Pope Pius the fifth, against Elizabeth the pretended Queene of England, and against the Heretikes that take her part.

Wherein also all her subiects are declared to be absolved from the Oath of Allegiance and any other dutie whatsoever, and besides they that doe obey her are pronounced accursed.

Pius the seruant of the seruants of God for remembrance thereof in time to come.

(74) He that reigneth aboue, to whom is giuen all power in Heauen and Earth, hath committed in fullnesse of power to be gouerned, one holy Catholike and Apostolike Church (where-out is no falsation) to one onely in Earth, namely, Peter the Prince of the Apostles, and to the Romane Bishop the Successor of Peter. And him alone hath he made Chiefe ouer all Nations and Kingdomes, who may roote out, destroy, scatter, waste, plant and build: that the faithfull people knit together with the band of mutual Charity, might be kept in the vinity of the Spirit, and presented in health and safety vnto their Sauour. For the vndergoing of which office we being called by the goodnesse of God to the government of the said Church, doe refuse and omit no paines, labouring by all means that this vinity and Catholike Religion (which the Author thereof for the trial of the Faith of those that be his and for our correction and amendment, hath suffered to be tossed with so great afflictions) might be preferred whole and entire. But the number of the wicked hath so much increased in power, that now there is no place in the world left, which they haue not attempted to corrupt by most wicked doctrine among the rest, Elizabeth the seruant of sinfulness, the pretended and vnlawful Queene of England, with whom, as in a Sanctuary the most wicked persons of all doe finde a refuge. This Queene, ruling the Kingdom, and monstrously vsurping to her selfe the place of the Supreme Head of the Church throughout all England, and the chief authority & iurisdiction of the same, hath reuoked againe to miserable ruine this very Kingdom which was in a manner recovered againe to the Catholike faith and good deuotion. For the vse of the true Religion (which the most lawfull Queene, Mary of famous memory by the helpe of this Seate, had repaired, being before by the Apostata, Henry the eighth, ouerthrowne) now by strong hand restrained, and the errors of hereticks embraced and followed; shee hath removed the Councell of State that consisted of the English Nobility, and sild the same with obscure heretick fellows; shee hath oppressed the Professors of the Catholike faith, and hath set vp wicked Preachers and Ministers of impieties. Shee hath abolished the Sacrifice of the Masse, Prayers, Almes, difference of meate, single life, and Catholike rites. Shee hath commanded bookes to be set forth containing manifest Heresie, and her selfe vsing and obseruing wicked Rites and Institutions, according to Caluins prescription; hath also commanded them to be obeyed by her subiects. Shee hath presumed to cast our Bishops of Churches, Rectors, and other Catholike Priests, from their Churches and Benefices, and to dispose of them and other Ecclesiasticall liuings among Heretick men; presuming also to iudge of Church matters; shee hath forbidden the Prelates, the Church and people, that they should not acknowledge the Romane Church, nor that they obey his Precepts and Canonall Instructions, shee hath compelled many to yeeld to her wicked lawes, and to forswear and abiure the authority and obedience of the Romane Bishop, and to acknowledge her by their Oath the onely Governour in temporal and spirituall matters; shee hath imposed penalties and punishments vpon those which were not obedient to her command, and hath exacted the like vpon them which persecuted in the vinity of the Faith, and in the aforesaid obedience; shee hath cast into prison the Catholike Governours and Rectors of Churches, where many, laden with daily languishings and sorrow, haue wofully ended their liues. All which things forasmuch as they are notorious and manifest to all Nations, and so approved by the most graue testimonie of very many, that no way is left them, for excuse, defence, or euasion. We moued by the impieties and mischiefs that more and more multiply, besides the grieuances of the faithfull, the affliction of Religion which groweth daily more intolerable by the meanes and working of the said Elizabeth, whose minde is so hardened and indurate, that shee hath not onely contemned the godly praiers and admonitions of Catholike Princes for her health and conuersion, but also hath not suffered the messengers of this See to come into England to her about this business; We, I say, moued by these causes, haue of necessity beaken our selues to the weapons of Iustice against her, not being able to refrain from griefe and sorrow, that wee must needs punish such a one, whose Ancestors haue so well deured of the Common weale, and of all Christendome. Being therefore strengthened with his authority, who hath pleased to let vs in this supreme Throne of Iustice, though vnfit for so great a burthen, we by the fullnesse of our Apostolike power, doe declare the foresaid Elizabeth an Hereticke, and a maintainer of Heretikes, and those that take her part in the things aforesaid, to haue incurred the sentence of Anathema, and to be cut off from the vinity of Christs body. And moreover that shee is deprived of the pretended right of her said Kingdom, and also from all Rule, dignity, and preheminent whatsoeuer, and also her Nobility, Subjects and People of the said Realme, and all other which haue sworn vnto her, by any manner of meanes are absolved for euer from such Oath, and from all duty of Empire, fidelity and obedience, in such sort as we doe absolve them by the authority of these presents, and deprive the said Elizabeth of the pretended right of the Kingdom, and of all other things aforesaid. And we doe command and forbid all and singular of the Nobility, Subjects, People, and other aforesaid, that they presume not to obey her admonitions, commands, nor lawes. Whosoever shall doe otherwise, we doe enwrappe them in the like curse. And because it were too difficult a matter to beare these presents to euery place where there is need, we will that the Copies of them being signed with the hand of the publike Notary, and the Ecclesiasticall Prelate, or with the Scale of his Court, haue the same credit and authority in Court, and without it with all Nations euery where, that the presents themselves should haue if they were exhibited. Isaiah 59. 5.

The fruits and effects of the Popes Bull.

my selfe, that many more attempts were plotted then euer were displayed. For the thunderbolt of curses throwne from that Iupiter of Rome, denouncing her Maiesty vn capable either of Crowne or Kingdome, rooke such rootes in the hearts of these Locusts, that they both armed themselves openly to battel, and secretly fought to imbrue their barbarous hands in their Princes blood.

(76) For this Brutish Bull, calued in the Popes Conclitoy (or rather Cow-house) and now able to trauell from Rome; in London, and at the West ende of Pauls, first put forth his hornes, being there hung vpon the Bishops Pallace gate, by a lewde person imploied as an Ieraulm from the Pope. Moreouer an old English fugitive (as hath bene said) had procured it: brazen faced Sanders in his writings maintaineth it; Briflow in his Motiues approued it, Northumberland and Newill had put it in practice, John Felton had diuulged it, the two Nortons supported it, and many after-followers assaid to execute it; all which, like Serpents bite the bosome, wherein themselves lay, but neuer could hurt her, the Lords beloved, and holy Anointed, who in peace & glory came to her graue, and in a full age, as a ricke of Corne into the Barne in due season.

(77) The Marshallists, besides them in the North, were John Brockmorton, Thomas Brooke and George Redman with others, who intended with found of Trumpet and Drumme, to proclaime their diuallish designe at Harleston Faire in the County of Norfolke; their shew being for the suppression of Strangers, but their maine end, to make a strange alteration in the State; whereby they hastened their owne ends, suffering a death due to Traitors.

(78) But more dangerous were those Conspirators, which secretly plotted to bring in forraigne powers, or publicly by their writings animated men thereunto, defaming the faire face of Elizabeths Government; in which kinde Sanders and Briflow two English fugitives, were the Tamnes and Lambes that withstood Moses; men of corrupt mindes, and enemies to the Faith & Traitors, heady and high minded, hauing a shew of godlinesse, but denying the power thereof; as the Apostle prophesied, that in the last daies such should arise: both of them approving Pius Quintus his proceeding about her Maiesties deprivation, and iustifying the wicked in their rebellions, contrarie to the doctrine of that Apostle, whose Chaire they pretend to vphold. From which sinke of iniquity, issued those corrupt streames, that became bitter as wormewood, the taste whereof brought many to their vintimely, but well-deserued, deatnes: among whom, first was Felton, the two Nortons, Kenelm Barne, and Edmund Mather; not long after whom, followed Doctor Story, who may not bee forgotten in our Story.

(79) This man by birth was English, though an Alien in heart, by profession a Ciuitian, and Doctor of the Canon Law, a persecutor of Gods Saints in the daies of the last Queene, and in this Queenes raigne, a turbulent inuigher against the Religion established in the English Church. For which being apprehended and committed to prison, he found means of escape, and in Antwerpe received Commission vnder Duke D'Alua, to search all Shippes comming thither, for English bookes; not forgetting his tyranny wherein he had bene trained, nor to further traitorously many and great attempts to bring in forraigne powers, for Englands ouerthrow. But the pit that he digged, he fell into himselfe, and the destruction prepared for others, light on his owne pate; for one Parker, an English Marchant, loially affected to his Prince, trading to Antwerpe, laid his snare faire to catch this foule birde; causing secret notice to be giuen vnto Story, that in his Ship were store of Hereticall bookes, with other intelligences, which might stand him in steede.

(80) The Canonist conceiuing that all was Cock-sure

Cock-sure, hasted to execute his Commission himselfe, where with lookees very bigge vpon the poore Mariners, each Cabbin, Chest and Corner, about borde were searched, & some things found to draw him further on; so that the hatches must bee opened, which seemed to bee vnwillingly done, and great signes of feare was shewed by their faces. This drew on the Doctor to defend into the hold; where now in the trap, the mouse might well gnawe, but could not get out; for the hatches went downe, and the sailes hoisted vp, which with a merrie gale were blowne into England, where ere long hee was arraigned and condemned of high Treason, and accordingly was executed at Tiborne, as he had well deserved.

(81) To the like end came Sherwin, Campion, Kirby, with others seditious trumpetters of this infamous Bull, and Sanders the Irish Legate, and greatest maintainer of his goring authority, though hee escaped the Barre of iustice, yet was found out by a rauiing Phrensie, as he wandred fuccourlesse in the waste mountaines of Ireland, wherein lastly he miserably died. But to leaue these poisonous tongue-men and libellous pen-men to register their owne shame, and feare their consciences with the brand of sinne; let vs discouer those other daring and swarding Monsters, who actually imploied themselves, to lay, either violent hands vpon her Maiesties person, or the Land open to forraigne inuasions.

(82) The first of them (or first manifested) was John Sommersuile of Essex in Warwickshire, a furious young man, who like a tempest that threatened destruction, came ragingly forward towards the Court, with intent to murder the Queene; the progresse of which attempt summarily was thus. Keeping his Whitford with Arden (his viues father) he was there so wrought by Halla Seminary Priest, as hee conceiued a desperate rage against her Maiesty, holding it a matter (seeing there was no hope of alteration during the life of the Queene) meritorious to make her away; to which bloody resolution, he was further intigated by his wicked wife. Whereupon returning home, hee grew much perplexed, hauing many feares and conflicts in himselfe, which caused his wife to write vnto Hall, to come and strengthen the man with firmer resolutions. But he, busied elsewhere with the like purposes, by letter excused his not comming, yet therein aduited him to goe forward, promising hee would assit him with his praiers to God for his good successe.

(83) This letter received, hee grew fully resolved to aqtuate the designe, and hasted his journey a-mayne towards London, who no sooner departed, but that his wife sent Halls letter vnto her mother, and shee presently made it knowne to Arden her husband, which letter hee caused to bee burnt as soone as himselfe was called in question. But Sommersuile discouraged by the way, was indited in Warwick, and those his Associates condemned of high Treason in London; Sommersuile confessing his intent said, that hee had bene moued thereunto by his wicked spirit, and by the inticements of certain seditious persons, his Kinsmen and Allies, together with the often reading of pernicious bookes, published against her Maiesty. This desperate Ruffian committed to Newgate after his condemnation, most desperately strangled himselfe to death, an example of Gods seuerity against such sonnes of diabolicalty.

(84) Of which litter in the daies of this blessed Deborah, not so few as one hundred and twenty of knowne refuites and Seminaries scrawled like frogs, through her faire soile, croaking, and spawning their doctrine to recall obedience to the Pope, and dissuading the Subjects from the allegiance vnto their Queene: Of this number fifty three with pardon of life were banished the land, and the rest as Traitors died for conspiracy against her person, and breach of the law in that case enacted for the indemnity of the State. To shrowde themselves and their Disciples from that danger of law, at the suite of Campion, Perjoss, Haywood, and Hart, a dispensation was giuen to the Catholikes, from the rigor of the extent of the foresaid Bull: so that most of these Seminaries imploied for England, cast off their Serpentine skinner, and shewed themselves abroad in the attire of Gallants, the more safely to vent their enuemed drugges, and to keepe their Coules from preaching at the Gallows.

(85) To which end faculties were granted to Robert Persons and Edmund Campion, vntill they could make their party strong in England; which faculties were engrossed on this wise:

Petatur a Summo Domino nostro, explicatio &c.
Let there be defered of our most high Lord an explication or meaning of the Bull declaratory, made by Pius the fifth against Elizabeth, and such as do adhere or obey her: Which Bull the Catholikes desire to be under flood in this manner, that the same Bull shall alwayes bind her and the Heretikes, but the Catholikes it shall by no meanes bind, as matters doe now stand or be, till hereafter, when the publike execution of that Bull may bee had or made. And in the Conclusion thus, The highest Pontiffe granted these foresaid Graces to Father Robert Persons, and Edmund Campion, who are now to take their way into England the fourteenth day of April, in the yeere of our Lord 1580. being present, the Father Oliuerius, Manrique assistant. And though the one of these Spiders spinne his Webbe in corners, as hee could not be found, yet was the other swept downe by the hand of Iustice, and drew his last thread in the Triangle of Tyborne. After whom others, as some likewise before them, ploughing with the same Heifer, and sowing the furrowes with the same seed, reaped their harvest with no better increase then tares or darnell could yeeld, as was seene by their successe.

(86) Wherein Cuthbert Mayne in Cornwall had (before this time) borne a part, who armed with Agnus Dei, and an old Copie for a new Iubile, with some other Writings, maintaining the authority of Rome, dissuaded the naturall Subjects from their due obedience, deliuering diuers holy Graines (as hee termed them) by which, hee that had such should bee knowne to bee sure of that side, and thereby to bee defended in the bloody day, as by his inditement flatheth vpon Record, and confessed vnder his own hand.

(87) Nelson, Hanse, Lacies, Briant, Cotam, and a great number of others, were all of them imploied, to draw the hearts of the Subjects from their Soueraigne, and to prepare way to an intended inuasion. And left massing Priests should bee wanting to make easie the trues of their winding deulies, when their Cobwebs were wouen, Thompson brought Holy Oyle to besmeare their shaven Crowns; Hemford a dispensation of Pius Quintus his Bull, not to extend to the Catholikes, untill oportunitie serued; and Haydocke was doubly employed, both to prepare aides to assit the enterprise, and to note the fittest landing places, for forraigne forces, which himselfe first word to Doctor Allen hee had done.

(88) But John Paine a Priest stepped yet somewhat further, in practising the death of her Maiesty, who with fifty Refuites, furnished at the Popes charge, was appointed violently to assaile her, being slyly guarded as shee tooke her recreation abroad. These and such others are the men that are made Martyrs in the Popes Bead-rolle, as chosen vessels to suffer for the Romish cause, of which number Sanders was not worthy to be, as himselfe Doctor-like signified in his letter vnto Allen, which here I insert, according to the original, so shew what honest hearts he & his Mates did beare towards their Native Country.

to greater comfort, then the successe that followed could maintain. O pittifull change of things, the more need of peace within, to withstand such troublesome perfec-tions as you there have suffered. I am not worthy to partake them: they are for more chosen vessels. God grant you all there to know your owne blessing, and to thank God of it. I had as much before my eyes long before, and still thinke that wee shall have no steady comfort but from God: a x. A. A. not o. x. Therefore I beseech you to take hold of the Pope, for the King of Spaine is as fearefull of warre, as a Child of fire: and all his endeavours is to avoid all such occasions. A will give two thousand when you there shall be content with them. If they do not serve to goe to England, at the least they will serve to goe into Ireland. I thank you hartly for the favour you have shewed to Gibbons brother, it seemeth to be a blessed boord for Gods sake continue your favour still this way, albeit I feare mee your Seminarie will againe fall to dispersion. I have none other thing in this world so at the heart as to be with you: nor can I get leave to depart hence. Therefore if it so fall that it be no hinderance for you to come hither, lose not the occasion. Vale in Christo Iesu vicerame, ego te tuar in Domino, qui te in eternum tuatur. (90) By this wee see, what plottes were intended for the subversion of England, and what fruits those Italianate Fugitives brought forth; but as men cannot gather grapes from the Thorne, neither do finde the figges on the Thistle, so let these brambles bring forth their owne berries, and let their handes be prickt that seeke to plucke them; as indeed they did theirs, of whom wee are to write; whereof Francis Throgmorton a Gentleman well educated and of a good witte was one; who weary of longer delay, after for many yeeres plotting and consulting of an Inuasion, resolved to be the man himselfe, to bring the matter to an issue.

(91) This man solicited by Barnardine Mendoza, the Spanish Leager-Ambassador lying in London, undertooke a most dangerous designe against his dread Soueraigne, and native Country, which was to bring in a forraigne Army, and to alter Religion, with alienation of the Crowne and State. His imploiment was to sound the hauens for entrance, and to collect a Catalogue of the names of such great men in every County of England, as stood for the Papall cause, vnto whom Charles Paget (masked under the names of Mope and Spring) was ioyned for an assistant. Sir Francis Englefield in the Low-Countries, and others elsewhere had vehemently solicited the King of Spaine to attempt Englands Inuasion, and the Duke of Guise, undertooke to be the principall leader, conditionally that Rome and Spaine, would beare the charge of the warre.

(92) For compassing this ploit, Throgmorton (for his part) had plotted a chard of the hauens and harbours of England, and gathered his Catalogue of Catholike aiders, which hee presented vnto Mendoza. In this his Suruey no place was held fitter to land these forraigne powers, then was Arundell in Suffex, both for the neere cutte from those parts of France, where the Guise meant to muster his men, as also for the opportunity of assured persons, to giue them assistance, as they did presume. The want was onely Money; for which, messengers were employed vnto Rome and to Spaine, whose returne was daily expected with bagges and Bills of Exchange, as they wished and hoped, which confidently was assured by Barnardine Mendoza, promising that the King his Master would beare halfe the charge of the enterprize.

(93) The treason thus forwarded and ready for execution, the Watchman of Israel, who cuer waked for the defence of his Anointed, and walled her Vineyard with his owne protection, shooke out the fruit of this ill-conceiued seed from the huske, before it was ripe. For Throgmorton sodainly apprehended, and his study searched, the Catalogue of Romanized Gentlemen of euery Shire, and the Hauens for landing of forraigne power, were therein found: with certaine Petigrees touching the title to the English Crowne, and some infamous libels published beyond seas against her Maiesties person. But a certaine Casket couered with greene veluet, was cunningly conuaued from vnder a bed, and carried to the Spanish Ambassador, wherein many things lay hid that neuer after came to light; as also a letter which himselfe was then writing in Ciphers, hee conuaued from the fight of the searchers: all which himselfe confessed, and with his owne penne wrote the whole Conspiracy, for which, after iudgement hee most worthily died.

(94) Not warned by these, William Parry (as he named himselfe) a man of a profuse wastfulness, riot, and prodigality, hauing consumed two widows wealthes, and wounded his Creditor, by committing Burglarie, was for the fact condemned to die, but fued and obtained his pardon of life by the compassionate mercy of Queen Elizabeth, which he, vngrateful man, sought to requite, by vowing her death, that faued him from his. For traueilling into forraigne parts, and there obtaining the title of a Ciuillian Doctor, he fell from his naturall allegiance (as riotous Malecontents usually doe) and reconciled himselfe vnto the See of Rome, then hauing frequent acquaintance and conference with certaine leuiticall Priests, was finally inspired with a hellish resolution to kill her who had giuen him life.

(95) Whereunto hee was further incited by Beneditto Palmio a father Iesuite, Christopher de Salazar, Secretary to the Catholike King, and Thomas Morgan an English Fugitiue, Anniball a Coadiutor his Confessor, approving the diuillish designe; and Ragazzoni the Popes Nunzio, promising that this Catholike seruice should be remembered at their Altar. Two things were yet wanting, to strike vp this Catastrophe, which were the Popes approbation, and his Absolution from all his sinnes: to procure which, Cardinal Como was employed, who for effectually followed the business, that both were shortly procured, and sent him into England with a warrant to proceed in his Holinesse name.

(96) Thus armed from Rome, his promises on earth, and his vows in heauen, the worke seemes meritorious, and the Queene must die: to effect which, no fitter way could be found, then to faine himselfe a false Traitor indeed. For hauing priuate access to her presence, was heard at large, that hee was the man who had undertaken her death, which to sound the deepe waters, and to beare faile with the fairest hee promised to doe, with no intent, as hee constantly affirmed, to act that imposed charge, but onely to discouer those who laid for her life. Her Highnesse (whose piercing vnderstanding was not easily blinded or beguiled with words) seemed to doubtfully to interpret his confessed fact (which yet hee kept secret from her nearest Counsellors) that he in great feare departed; as how can a confidence so clogged but feare? Whereupon his late letter from Como hee shewed; which seeming also to be little esteemed, and his suit to be M^r. of S^t. Katherine, vterly reiectet, confirmed more desperately his resolution to kill her and often hauing weapon, presence, place & opportunity, purposely thought to performe it, but cuer was daunted when he beheld the glory of her presence, and Maiefty in her face, wherein to his seeming the Image of God, in her his Vice-gerent, was portraied, commanding him obedience, and threatning destruction to those who intend violence against his holy anointed.

(97) This Sinners part thus sayling, he sought to vndermine the walles yet another way; his vows resting in heauen were holy motives (forsooth) to this hellish act, and Allens booke redoubling his former resolutions (wherein euery word was a warrant for his prepared minde, and euery line taught, that Kings might bee depriued, excommunicated, and violently violently deposed, in case of the religion of Rome) vpon these spurrees hee posited to a worthy Gentleman, whom hee supposed as discontented as himselfe, opening his Treasons for the bringing in of forraigne inuaders soliciting his assistance, and threatening with dagge or dagger to kill the Queene.

(98) The Gentleman, loathing this horrible intent, revealed the Treason vnto two principall Priue Counsellors, and they vnto her Maiefty, who committed his examination vnto Sir Francis Walsingham her principall Secretary, a man of exquisite iudgement, integrity and industry in all state affaires and intelligences; the Treasons then found out, and confessed by himselfe, were diuulged by his voluntarie pen, and subscribed vnto, with his owne hand, with many other circumstances vnkowne before, and againe were seconded by another letter, written to the Lords of the Council, which heere out of the Originall, I haue inserted.

(99) My Lords, now that the conspiracy is discouered, the fault confessed, my conscience cleared, and minde prepared patiently to suffer paines due for so heinous a crime: I hope it shall not offend you, if crying, Miserere, with the poore Publicane, I leane to despair with cursed Caine. My case is rare, and strange, and for any thing I can remember singular: a naturall Subject solemnly to vowe the death of his naturall Queene, (so borne, so knowne, and so taken by all men) for the reliefe of the afflicted Catholike, and restitution of Religion. The matter first conceived in Venice, the seruice (in general word) presented to the Pope, continued and undertaken in Paris, and lastly, commended and warranted by his holinesse, digested and resolved in England, if it had not bene preuented by accusation, or by her Maiesties greater lenity and more grations vnto her Catholike Subjects. This is my first and last offence conceived against my Prince, or Country, and doth (I cannot deny) containe all other faults whatsoever. It is now to be punished by death, or most graciously (beyond all common expectation) to be pardoned. Death I doe confesse to haue deserued: life I doe (with all humilitie) craue, if it may stand with the Queens Honour, and policie of the time. To leaue so great a Treason unpunished, were strange; to drawe it by my death in example, were dangerous. A souldier seruant to take vpon him such an enterprize, vpon such a ground and by such a warrant, hath not bene seene in England. To indite him, arraigne him, bring him to the Scaffold, and to publish his offence, can doe no good. To hope that hee hath more to discouer then is confessed, or that at his execution he will on any thing he hath written, is in vaine. To conclude, that it is impossible for him in time to make some part of amends, were very hard and against former experiences. The question then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (lest the matter be mistaken) vpon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine owne opinion (though partiall) I will deliver you my conscience. The cases good Queene Elizabeths; the offence is committed against her sacred person; and shee may (of her mercy) pardon it without prejudice to any. Then this I say, in few words, as a man more desirous to discharge his troubled conscience, then to liue. Pardon poore Parrie, and releue him: for life without liuing is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous or dishonourable to the Queenes Maiefty (as by your fauours I thinke it full of honour and mercy) then I beseech your Lordships (and no other) once to heare me before I be ended, and afterwards, if I must die, humbly to entreat the Queenes Maiefty to hasten my trial and execution: which I pray God, with all my heart, may proue as honourable to her, as I hope, it shall be happy to me. who will, while I liue (as I haue done alwayes) pray to Iesus Christ for her Maiesties long and prosperous raigne. (100) And according to this his last request, his inditement was framed, and arraignment performed at Westminister, where hee pleaded himselfe guilty and had iudgement of a Traitor. Which accordingly was executed in the Palace at Westminister, vpon the second of March following; where (whether for feare of preiudicing and discrediting the Romanists cause, or by whatsoeuer other perswasion) he impudently denied, that hee euer had an intent to kill the Queene, notwithstanding all his owne former confessions, witness of the fact, and other cleare evidences of truth amongst which the letter receiued from Cardinal Como is not vnworthy to be here annexed, whose translation from the originall, written in the Italian tongue, is as followeth.

(101) Sir, his Holinesse hath sent your letter of the first, with the assurance included, and cannot but commend the good disposition and resolution, which you write to be towards the seruice and benefit publicke: wherein his Holinesse doth exhort you to perseuer, with caution to be brought to effect that which you promise. And to the end you may be so much the more helped by that good spirit which hath moued you therunto, his holinesse doth grant you plenary indulgence, and remission of all your sinnes, according to your request. Assuring you that besides the merite that you shall receive therefore in heauen, his Holinesse will further make himselfe debtor to acknowledge and requite your seruings, by all the best means he may. And that so much the more in that you use the more modesty in not pretending any thing. Put therefore to effect your holy and honorable determinations, and attend your health. And to conclude, I offer my selfe vnto you hartly, and wish all good and happy successe. From Rome, the xxx. of January, 1584.

(102) Had not then her Maiefty iust cause to complaine, as shee did it when in the honourable assembly of Parliament, the openly professed, that shee knew no creative breathing, whose life stood howe in more perill then her owne; and that euen at the first entrance into her estate, shee entred into infinite dangers of life, as one that had to wrestle with many and mighty enemies. And yet, in confidence of her celestiall Protector, and of her owne innocency, shee often seemed somewhat too remisse and neglectiue in the care of her selfe and life as appeared manifestly by her proceedings with this last Traitor, in keeping his conference of that importance, from the knowledge of her Counsellors, and often admitting priuately his access, though hee had tolde her, hee was the man appointed to worke, her death. And indeed such was this Princeesse Magnanimity, that in an apparent danger, as great, though not so traitorous as this, she shewed a resolution of courage farre above her sexe; when being in her Barge vpon Thames to take the aire, accompanied with the French Ambassador, the Earle of Lincolne, and others, a Seruingman in the Court with his Calliur discharged a Bullet, and shot the Waterman, within five foote of her seat; (the second to her Bales) through both the armes; whereat all other being amazed, and the man abundantly bleeding, shee threw him her Garffe, and with words of comfort bad him be of good cheere, he should not want, for the bullet was aimed at her, though it hit him; and with such resolute courage bare it out, as all present, admired. Neither so onely, but knowing afterwards that it was done casually at randome, shee both pardoned the partie of his life, when he was to die, and commanded his Master to retaine him againe into his seruice.

(103) And indeed, of so singular clemency, and inbred lenity was this Lady, that shee neuer heard mention of the capital (though neuer so deserved) punishment of offenders, euen of such as had sought her owne death, but it bred a kinde of horror and sorrow in her; whereby, had not her Counsellors earnestly inculcated the necessity of such exemplary Iustice, many dangerous attēpters had escaped their duc punishment. Which moued her to say, being once questioning with a great Diuine of Oxford, about bookes meetest for Princes to study on, that her Reading of Seneca de Clementia, had done her much good, but some would perfwade her, it had done her State as much harme. But for her loue to her people in generall, and tender care ouer the poorer sort, or any waies oppressed, it was incomparable; whose cares were not only open at all times to their complaints, and her hands ready to receiue their petitions; but her manner was also to commend their cause vnto her Counsellors and Iudges, giuing these and the like earnest charges; I haue care of my people, you haue my place: do you to them that which I ought to do they are my people, yet euery man oppresseth and spoileth them without mercy. I myselfe can neither helpe themselues nor reuenge their quarrells: See vnto them, I pray you, see vnto them, for they are my charge, them therefore I charge you with, euen as God hath committed them vnto me. I care not for my selfe, my life is not deare vnto mee, my care is for my people; I pray God my Successor bee as carefull for them; and surely they which might know my cares for my people, may likewise conceiue, that I take no great ioy in wearing the Crowne.

(104) What heart then could conceiue so great mischief, or haue could bee so barbarously violent, as to worke the destruction of ioy louing a nursing Mother, but onely those obdurate and venomous Vipers, which eat forth the way from the wombe of their owne conceptions? Or rather those sting-tailed Locusts, arising with foggy smoke from the bottomlesse pit, who to reare vp their Dagon or great King Abaddon, cast downe Princes with the wings of their warre, and execute their damnable doctrine in the murders of the Lords anointed; whereas Dauid durst not touch Saul, though he was abieted by God.

(105) Those Profelites to vncessantly, yeere by yeere, prosecuted the Romane cause, that many of them thereby deservfully came to their deaths; amongst whom was Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland, gone so farre in such disloyall enterprizes, as being vpon suspicion of Treason committed to the Tower of London, he laid violent hands vpon his own life, by discharging a Dagge, charged with three bullets, vnder his left pappie, wherewith he pierced his heart, and presently dying, was by a Iurie found guilty of his owne death. The Treason laid against him (besides the former of the insurrection in the North, by himselfe confessed, and by the Court fined at five thousand Markes) was, that he had been priuy to the Plots of Throgmorton, for the bringing in of Forreine powers, to the destruction of the Queen and Realme; which truth being revealed by other conspirators, he so deeply apprehended, as in that desperate manner hee preuented his further iudgement.

(106) In the same place (though after the Spanish attempt for Inuasion Anno 1583. which purpose we yet passe over, to auoide interrupting of particular mens Treasons and designs) Philip Earle of Arundell, and Sir John Perce late Lord Deputy of Ireland, both of them condemned of high Treason, by course of nature ended their liues; the one, seeking to escape the Land, was first fined at ten thousand pounds, and afterwards found guilty of a higher offence, had sentence of death: the other likewise, for plotting with Spaine, to open their way into Ireland, gaue way to the Law to take hold on his life.

(107) Neither were these great ones drawne alone into the confederacie of Romes irreligious purposes, but others also, thirsting for Englands destruction, of lesse quality or place, had parts appointed to be actors in the Scene; which parties themselves shal now enter the Stage, euen foureteene in number; wherof Anthony Babington Esquire, was the principall, the others were Chiscole Tichborne, Charles Tilney, Edward Abington, Thomas Salisbury, and Edward Jones Esquires, John Saunge, Robert Barmeswell, Henrie Dun, John Trauerse, John Charnocke, and Richard Gage, Gentlemen, and John Ballard a Seminary Priest; for can there be any conspiracies hatched without them? The plot was the more dangerous, by how much the more secretly carried, and the parties resolute to venture therein vnto death, wherof fixe undertooke to murder the Queene, and Saunge bound himselfe for her death.

(108) The few must be against the precise Puritanes, whose chiefe or * head in the Low Country, not only threatened (as was pretended) the destruction of all Romish Catholikes, but also to vsurpe the Crowne from the Queene; and therefore for the security of both, they were thus enforced to make ready for armes. Their riders in England were many, as Babington beleueed, who wrote that the West parts, the North parts, all Wales, the Counties of Lancaster, Darby, and Stafford, were in great forwardnesse, and had giuen fidelity to giue aide to the enterprize. That Lord Percy could doe much in the North, Arundell in the South, and the Lord Paget in the heart of the Land, though two of them were then in Prison, and Paget in Spaine; their onely want was of a Nobleman to leade them, wherof they were destitute, as Babington complained, vnlesse it were Westmorland, and he out of the Realme.

(109) Their forreine assisers were many and strong, especially Spaine, as Mendoza assured them. The Ports were appointed where the Inuaders should land; and once landed, should be seconded from all parts by the Italianated English, as they vainly hoped; the Statists surprized which held not for Rome; the faith restored that had beene abandoned; and the vsurping Competitor (for so they termed the true appointed Soueraigne) dispatched by murders themselves the onely men marked (if euer) now to redeeme the Land, from the seruitude and bondage, which Heresie had brought, with the losse of thousands of Soules. These were their gloses vpon Pius Quintus his alleged Text, and the faire viſards that hid their foule faces; whom God himselfe vnmasked to their following shame.

(110) For Ballard being sent to Mendoza, to signifye all things now in a readinesse, and ready to embark himselfe for France, was suddenly apprehended; and part of the conspiracy discouered. Whereupon Babington, with Charnock and Saunge, enters a new resolution, which was immediately to kill the Queene, whereas of their bounty it had beene ordered before, that shee should liue vntill the Inuasion, which was appointed to bee in September following. But being intercepted before he well wist, he was committed to Custody, yet so as hee went abroad with his Keeper, from whom hee shortly made his escape; and thinking to recover the Seas, disguised himselfe like a Labouring man, staining with wall-nut-tree leaues his hands and face, which shadowed neither his shame nor sinne, neither yet could hide him from the eye that called him to account; for being desired and brought backe to London, he was with curses of the people committed to the Tower, whence he could not so easily start.

(111) The other conspirators, hearing of these their confederates successe, dispersed themselves and plaid least in sight, yet were they found out, indicted and brought to their tryals, all of them confessing their treasons without any torture. Yet at their arraignment (perswading themselves belike, that what they did by papall warrant, could not be called Treason,) they pleaded not guilty, which the Iury vpon manifest proofes finding otherwise, they worthily receiued iudgement of death, and died accordingly in Lincolnes Inne fields, euen in the place where they had often conferred for the execution of their Treasons.

(112) The nest of conspirators thus broken in England, and their innes still failing though neuer so craftily laid, was a forecourse to the English fugitiues

tiues in other forreigne parts; especially to the Iesuits, whose griefes were as great, as is the paine of a Scorpion when he hath Runge a man. Among whom Iagues Frances a perfidious Traitor, and bafe Laundresse sonne, seeing the Catholicks thus cast downe and their case desperate, if treasons thus thus preuented and punished, pronounced this maxime out of his vnswathed mouth, that the State of England then was, and would be so, as vnlesse Mistress Elizabeth (for so he termed his dread Soueraigne) were suddenly taken away, all the Duels in Hell would not be able to preuaile against, or shake it. And Stanley that transgouerning Champion for Spaine and Rome, so impatient was of these vnprospered proceedings, that he hired Patrick Cullen, an Irish Fencer and Ruffian, to undertake the death of the Queene; which he did for the summe of thirty pounds, but had no more for his money then the report of a Traitors death, which deferuently hee suffered at Tyburne.

(113) To accompany and second these treasons of Cullen, Cresswell the Legier Iesuite in Spaine, writ his traitorous booke vnder the name of Philopater, as after him Campbell alias Parfons, another Iesuite, and Rector at Rome, did the like, vnder the name of Doelman, concerning titles of the Crowne, both full of falshood, treason, and impudencie, as (though the Authors be vnnamed,) whoeuer looketh on the brats, will easily know their Fathers by the resemblance.

(114) This desperate designe failing, another as diuillish was assaid to bee practiced, wherein, no English man was yet knowne to haue had any hand, the Actors being onely Spaniards and Portugals, the onefolliciting by promises of great rewards, the other vnder taking to worke the death of the Queene, which was contriued, that poison should be giuen her in Physicke, a designe indeed most fezible and in-cuitable, had not that heliath hand bene laid by a heavenly. Rodericke Lopez was the Physitian, a Doctor of that profession and a Portugall by birth, in especiall trust and practise for the state of her health.

(115) Hee a fit instrument to act without suspect, receiued for an earnest, a Jewell of gold, of good value, garnished with a great Diamond, and a large Rubie, from Christopher de Mox, a speciall Counsellor of the King of Spaine, whose lustre so dazzled his eyes, as the practise of treason possessed his heart, and vpon farther payment of fifty thousand Crownes, hee couenanted to take away her Maiesties life, in a potion giuen her vpon pretence of health. For the assurance of which money, Manuel Andrada, the bringer of the Jewell, conferred with the Conde de Fuentes at Callis, and Stephano Ferrera, a Portugall also, delt likewise by letters with Stephano Ibarra the Kings Secretary at Brussels, to make the same readie. Lopez himselfe assuring them the deed should bee done, when the money was paid, which daily was promised and daily expected; the onely flay pretended was, that King Philip did not well like, that so bafe a person as Andrada was, should be employed in so waighy a cause.

(116) Whereupon Ferrera of better repute with the King, receiued bills of exchange for the money, deliuered by the Conde Fuentes, and from the said Conde, Manuell Lewis another Portugall, was profusely sent into England to conferre with Ferrera, and they both with Lopez, who faithfully promised vpon the payment of the money to performe the villanie. At which very instant Gods mercy did bring to light the conspiracy, through the continuall vigilancy of some Lords of the Counsell, in which number neuer any Prince had more, Sapient, Sedulous, Proudident, and experienced Sages, then shee had.

(117) And to make experiment of his intendments, Lopez was appointed to giue the Queen Physicke, who made ready the potion, and brought it to her presence. But her Maiesty knowing what hee least suspected, told him, hee must goe minister to the Lord Treasurer, Cullen, who at that present had more need of Physicke then her selfe; wherupon Lopez with double diligence repaired vnto him, signifying his comming was to minister his Lordship Physicke, so commanded him by the Queene; yea marry said the old man but what is your Physicke? a purge Master Doctor said the Lord Treasurer, I thinke I must become a Physitian to purge you, and thereupon hee apprehended him for a Traitor, who stood so perplexed with feare, that his presence was scarce tollerable for the smell. Then other Doctors of Physicke were called; for to examine the ingredients, who easily found that the potion was poison, for which hee was indicted and arraigned at Barre, where hee pleaded not guilty, and his two Comforts by long circumstances sought to faue their liues, yet their former confessions subscribed with their owne hands, gaue sufficient testimony of their guilt, for which at Tyburne vpon the seauenth of Iuneth they suffered death.

(118) Stephano Ibarra thus failing of his purpose, by these Portugall fals, sought yet to raise the fabrick of his wicked intents, vpon the resolutions of some English fugitiues, among whom none were held more fit then Edmund Torke and Richard Williams, souldiers by profession, and two desperate Champions for the quarrell of Rome, vnto whom Hugh Owen an English Rebell, and Spanish Pensioner, shewed an assignation, vnder that Secretaries hand, of foure thousand Crownes to bee giuen them for to murder their Queene; and for assurance that the same should be forth coming, the assignation was deliuered in Deposite, to Holt an English Iesuite, who producing the Sacrament and kissing it, tooke solemne Oath to pay the money as soone as the fact was done.

(119) To forward this enterprize, three seuerall consultations were held at Brussels, wherein Holt fate as President, and William Stanley Professor for this diuillish designe, animating Torke by his vnles example, to be constantly resolved, as a man ordained for his Countries good, and though many had miscarried in attempting the Act, yet that it was meritorious and easie to be done. Thomas Throgmorton, Michell Moodie, Charles Paget, Henry Owen, Edmund Garret, and the two diuine Doctors, Gifford and Worthington, were principall speakers in this impious Parliament; all of them eager to egge on the two vnder takers, and to ioyne to them a third man, named Young, whose taske should be to kill the greatest Counsellors, as soone as the Queene should be dead. The last that spake was Holt the President, who after hee had ministered these Traitors their Oathes in threatening wise, menaced to take from the English this high and acceptable seruice, and to employ therein Strangers, who were farre more worthy; and so sent the two former into England with his blessing, which neuertheless could not faue them from the Gallows: their purposes were to get entertainment of some great Courtier, the better to effect what they intended, and to seeme men of some note for intelligence, sent from Callis to procure their passport, but the vigilant eye of the English state had found out their treasons before; & bringing them afterwards to their trialls, they were found guilty, iudged, & died like traitors.

(120) The last publicke attempt, that assailed the Queenes death, was Edward Squire, a Scriuener of Greenwich, who by deputation had employment of a Purueyer in the Stable, but being in wite about his vocation, and carrying his falles about his fortunes, put himselfe in action for Sea in the last voyage of Sir Francis Drake made into the Indies. Embarked he was in a small shippe, called the Frances, who looting the Flecte about Guadalupe, was taken by five Spanish Frigates, and with other brought Prisoners into Spaine: where falling in acquaintance with Richard Walpole an English fugitive by order a Iesuite, in great credit, and vicar Generall to Parson, in his absence, was by him obserued to be of more capacity then commonly was found in a man of his quality or education; for yeeres, mature, and passed his middle age; for carriage well aduised, and resolute enough, if not too much, in not apprehending his eminent danger.

Squire a fit subject to worke vpon.

(121) Vpon him Walpole therefore meant to worke, conceiuing for his purpose two speciall aduantages: the one, that coming into Spaine a Prisoner, and not a fugitive, his returne into England would be without suspect; the other, that Squire had beene employed in the Queenes Stable, and therefore had liberty of free access: But the more to inuolue what hee intended, hee subtilly caused Squire to be apprehended by the Inquisition, and put prisoner into the holy House: where mollified by distresse, hee got his heart into his hands, so that of a Neuter he became a fixed Romanist.

(122) This first assay prouing effectfull, for an introduction to his further intendments, he fell into the old fong; whose burden was the tyrannies vied, and the persecutions exercised in England against the poore Catholikes; vpon his few persons the English State did stand, and how easily those props were to be remoued, if any deuoted would put to their hands. Squire who wanted no wit to perceiue whereat he ayimed; first, gaue some slight signification, and after a more serious protestation, that hee was the man, that would sacrifice himselfe and his seruice in the cause.

(123) The good Father hauing thus got him into the circle, began then the charme: It were said he no doubt a worke meritorious to kill the Earle of Essex; but vnum necessarium, one thing is necessary:

And then would him plainly, that he meant to put a seruice vpon him of great worth, and reward; which he might accomplish without any euident perill of life, because it was to be done not immediately vpon her person, nor in her presence, neither yet in doing it (though hee were seene) should be endangered, being asked as hee would prescribe; and that was, to impoison the pommel of the Queenes Saddle, at such time as she should ride abroad, the Pommel being the place, whereon she would rest her hand, and her hand not vnlily to touch her mouth or nostrils, would giue access to the forcible poison. This, said he, might easily be performed, he hauing familiar acquaintance in the Quirry, yea and that very safely; but if otherwise, and immediate death happened, he should be assured, that for the exchange of this present and transitory life, to enioy the state of a Glorious Saint in Heauen.

(124) Which Syrens song ended, and Squire inueigled; confessions, vowes, promises, receite of the Sacrament, and all, confirmed the resolution of the diuillish attempt; and to prevent varying from this Center, Walpole told him, that now he stood in the state of damnation, if hee did not his uttermost endeavour to performe his vow, bidding him remember, how that the sinne of backsliding did seldom obtaine pardon; and if hee did but once make doubt of the lawfulness or merit of the act, it was enough to cast him head-long downe into hell; and if hee did conceiue any difficulties, hee wished him to consider what it auailed a man, to win the whole world, and to loose his owne soule.

(125) Squire thus armed (though not with that complete Armour of the Apostle) fell downe in confession before this Iesuite secte; whom he lifted vp, hugg him about the necke, with his left arme (such were Squires owne words) and crossing him with his other hand, mumbled a few words in Latine, and then distinctly in English spake thus: God blesse thee, and giue thee strength my sonne; bee of good courage, I pawne my soule for thine, and thou shalt haue my prayers dead and aliue. Thereupon deliuering vnto him the poyson, directed how it should be vsed, and shewed him the nature of the confectiō, which was, to bee put into a double bladder, and when it was to bee employed, to be pricked full of holes, and so pressed out vpon the pommel of the Queenes Saddle; the operation whereof was such, that vpon his hand hee must haue a thicke double gloue, least the poyson thereof should infect himselfe; whose vigour also was such, as neither continuance of time, nor subtilty of ayre could checke or vnuertuate the strength: And that the matter might be carried without all suspect, an exchange was accepted of two Spanish prisoners in England, for Roxley and Squire, to be released from Spaine.

(126) Thus himselfe poysoned in heart, and minding to poyson others, being monied by the Iesuite, arrived in England, not long before the expedition for Cadix; which action (as he thought) fitted him well, and thereupon made suite and obtained it, to attend the Earle of Essex in his owne ship; as well to be absent when the poyson should worke on her Maiesty (which he meant to bestow before his departure) as to haue opportunity thereby, to poyson the Earle himselfe. Occasion being giuen by the Queenes riding abroad, and her Horse made ready and attending in the Stable-yard, thether Squire repaired, full of euill spirits; and laying his hand vpon the pommel of her Saddle, bruised out the poyson in the bladder, saying cheerfully, God save the Queen; with no better affection then Loab bare to Amasa, when with his hand hee took him to kiss him, but with his sword strooke him to the heart. His part thus plaide, Gods wanted and wonderfull protection beganne, who vnder his Canopy or wings of mercy had euer shadowed her from the stroke of daungers; for albeit the season was hot, and the veines open to receiue any malignant tainture, yet her body felt no distemperature, nor her hand felt no more hurt, then Pauls did, when hee shooke of the Viper into the fire.

(127) The deed thus done, without all mistrust, Squire taking the remaine of the poyson, within fixe daies after departed to the Sea, and had his entertainment in the Earle of Essex his owne Ship, where seeking to finish his diuillish designe betwixt Faial and Saint Michaels bestowed his confectiō, vpon the pommels of a wooden chaire, wherein the Earle vsually fate at meales: which in like manner (the Lord so working) tooke not effect, to the little admiration of Squire, though very well satisfied, that the default was not his, but rather in the poyson it selfe; and his vow now discharged (as he thought) he slept the more quiet.

(128) Walpole the Iesuite ouer-tickled with ioye of his hoped successe, and notable longer to keepe secrecy, imparted his treasons to his companions in Spaine, who together with him daily expected the issue thereof, but all things silent, and no newes of the Catastrophe, they chaunged their opinions, and held Squire for a false brother, when as also their longing hearts beganne to feare, least the maine cauld would bee mard, being cast into so bad a mould. Whereupon a consultation was called, and the Sicophant condemned in the highest degree, whole end must be speedily wrought, or else those Catholike proceedings would surely come to wracke; for that he knowing much, would (as was feared) reucale much more; and therefore it was politickly concluded, that one should be let slip from them into England, to giue information of Squires treasons.

(129) This man to haue the more credit brought two letters in his budget, the one he affirmed, himself had stolne out of a Reisits study, & the other brought from another person, both which indeed were found to be counterfeit, and Squire for the present reputed an honest man. Yet because the matter was tender, and touched nere the quicker, Squire was sent for, and examined; at first he denies all, but coming to circumstances, something was found, hold taken, and the Traitor committed to Prison; who left alone, began to bethinke him how farre his Confessors Confession might extend, and therefore by good Counsell (the truth withall working) therein

he disclosed the Treason, and how true he had therein gon, which indeed no man had knowledge of but himselfe, and this confessed at the Tower, without torture, and at the Barre with remorse of conscience, he had his sentence of death, which he accordingly suffered.

(130) Had not then the wife Statists of the Land, cause to enact such Lawes as they did; to set the shakingsword in the entrance of this faire Eden, and to stoppe out the wilde Bore that would lay the vineyard wast? their Queene and lamp of Glory, hauing thus often and narrowly escaped extinguishing, by as many hands of murdering Priests and Iesuites, as David had pursuers of his life, when to Jonathan hee complained that there was but a steppe betwixt him and death? So that iustly in a conference of Parliament, for meane to be had against the many conspirators, daily leuellling at her royall heart, one of good repute, hauing experience of their desperate designs, in the open assembly, with a feeling affection, thus vttered his minde: that every night when hee awaked, hee feared to heare some newes of desperate mischief, and protested before God, hee neuer saw the light of the day, but that hee feared, before the Sun set, to heare of some strange attempt.

(131) For as the Pope had denounced vnder his Bulls, an absolutiō to him that would dethrone Elizabeth England faire Queen so were there many foule minded Profelites, that reputed her blood as an acceptable sacrifice, which many times they sought to offer vnto their God: but hers and our God, the Watchman of Israel, neither stumbled nor slept in protecting her Person as the apple of his eye; whose iust defence, her innocency, and their bloody guilts, haue often divulged to the whole world; neuer any Prince escaping so many dangers, as this most milde and mayden Queene in her daies had done, and many more no doubt were put in practice, which lay groueling in darkenesse, and neuer came to light, and as the works of darknessesse, loe them lie, and let vs hasten to our former, and farre more pleasing Subiect. Hauing therefore from the yeere 1570. made our digression, for the closer relation of all those treacheries together; let vs thence pursue the ensuing occurrents of her reigne and life.

(132) The troubles of Scotland were about that time, great and many, and much the more by the death of the new Regent, who was slaine by the hand of Treason, with the shot of an Harquebussie, as he rode through Lithgow, mistrusting no danger, at which time a Road was made into England, by such as little regarded the peace. Wherevpon Suffex the Earle Generall, accompanied with the Lord Hunsdon, Gouernour of Barwicke, in Hostile manner entered that kingdom; and in Tiuidale did much hurt to the Inhabitants.

(133) New troubles then arising for the death of the Regent, and the Land full of factions, threatening ciuill broiles, the English Queenes aide was sent for, by some of the Lords, who with their helps, prevailed in winning and demolishing many strong and faire Castles. And the Earle of Lennox sent into Scotland by her Maiesty, was first made Lord Gouernor, and after L. Regent, by the election of their three estates, who afterwards was trayterously murdered, as the other before him had beene, which caused great troubles in Scotland; yea and some Nobles of England were not exempted from the same.

(134) For Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, intending some fauours for the Scottish cause, proceeded so farre therein, as the letter of the Law took aduantage of his life, to the great sorrow and lament of very many. For being a man filled with fauour, both of his Prince, and of the People, fortune at length made him a Ball for her banding; who first from Burnam besides Windfore was brought to Westminster, and thence by water was left prisoner in the Tower, where he remained from the eleventh of October, vnto the fourth of August following, and then was remoied to the Charter-House neere Smithfield, where he abode thirteene moneths space; till lastly he was sent backe againe into the Tower, where vpon the hill and Ordinary Scaffold, he penitently suffered death; being the first vnforgotten English Noble that for offence lost life since Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne.

(135) About which time, a strange case (which we will infer, rather to shew the course of Iustice and mercy of the Queene, then for any other great vie in Story) happened at the Common-law barre: where Simon Lowe, and John Kyme were Plaintiffs, for a certaine Manor and demaines in the life of Harry, adioyning to that of Sheppey in Kent, wrongfully possessed (as they alleged) by Thomas Paramour, against whom they brought a writ of right: the defendant offered to maintaine his title by Combat, which the Plaintiffs accepted, and brought their Champions before the Iudges to the Barre. For Paramour was George Thorne, of a bigge and broad fer, who cast downe his Gauntlet as Challenger, to iustifie Paramours right, which was taken vp by Henry Naylor Master of defence, a man proper and slender, and not very tall, who appeared for Lowe and Kyme, to make good their claime.

(136) The place appointed for Combat was in Tuttle-fields, where a plot of ground of one and twenty yards square, was doubly rayled, and without the West-square a stage set for the Iudges, representing the Court of Common Pleas, behind the which two Tents were pitched, the one for Thorne, and the other for Naylor, the field with Scaffolds on euery side for people to see: All things thus ready, and the day drawing on, her Maiesty, (who euer abhorred all bloodshed), tooke the matter into her owne hands, and gaue command and directions for the parties agreement; with a furcate from all further suite, which could not well be, vnlesse the Champions appeared in field; who altogether ignorant of what was determined, vpon the day assigned appeared in place. Thorne was there first who was brought to his Tent by Sir Ierome Bowes; then came Naylor, hauing the Gauntletborne before him vpon a sword point, a truncheon (taper-wife) ripe with horne, about an elle long, and a shield of hard leather carried after him; and so was conuiced to his Tent by Sir Henry Cheiney.

(137) The Court set, and the Combatters called, Naylor entered the lists, being led by the hand by Sir Ierome Bowes, where making his obeisance, hee came to the barre, and there held vp his Shield. Then was Thorne brought into the lists by Sir Henry Cheiney and with like reuerence hee held vp his Shield: Whereupon an oth was ministred to the approuer, the tenor whereof he spake as followeth. Hear this you Iudges, that I haue this day neither eate, drunke, nor haue vpon me either bone, stone, ne grasse, or any enchantment, sorcery, or witchcraft, where-through the power of the word of God might be lessened or diminished, and the Diuels power increased: and that my appello is true, so helpe me God and his Saints, and by this Booke.

(138) Then was Proclamation made in her Maiesties name, that no perion of what euener state, degree, or condition there present, bee so hardy to giue any token or signe, by countenance, speech, or language, either to the prouer, or to the defender, whereby the one of them may take aduantage of the other: and no person to remouee, but keepe still his place: and euery perion to keepe their statutes and their weapons to themselves, and suffer neither the said prouer, nor defender to take any of their weapons, or any other thing that may stand either to the said prouer, or defender any auail, vpon paine of forfeiture of Lands, Tenements, Goods, Chattels, and imprisonment of their bodies, and making fine and ransom at the Queenes pleasure. But when all these Ceremonies were ended, the Lord Chief Iustice stood vp, and forbad the proceedings, allotting Paramour the Lands with the

(139) Peace flourishing in England, to no great liking of the Seminary, that often sought to disturbe it: the Regent of Scotland craued aide of her Maiestie, for the defence of the young King, and the Countie, endangered at that time with ciuill broiles. She as tender in her affection, as he dutifull in his allegiance, sent him fiftene hundred men, wherof Sir William Drury Knight Marhall of Berwicke was Generall. These comming to Edenborough laid battery to the Castle, with no lesse then thirty Canons, and were as valiantly resisted by the Scottish within, but for want of fresh water, and no aide to bee expected, the souldiers sick, hurt, ouer-wearied, and diuided in opinion, Lord Peteroe being let downe from the walle, by composition the Castle was surrendered, to the vie of the young King, whereupon the English returned to Berwick.

(140) This time of Elizabeths, like vnto that of Augustus, when the Temple of Ianus stood (for the most part) continually shut, made London like Rome, to be most magnificently repaired, and with many stately edifices adorned; among which for beauty and commodious life, none is more famous then the Royall Exchange (so named by her Highnesse) whole Founder was Sir Thomas Gresham Knight, Agent to her Maiefty, built for the confluence and commerce of Merchants, whose Traffikes were great, and in these times of peace, extended their Navigations into the farthest (and till then, vnsearched) parts of the world.

(141) For the searching and vnstatisfied spirits of the English to the great glorie of our Nation, could not bee contained within the bankes of the Mediterranean or Leuant Seas, but that they passed farre, towards both the Articke and Antarctike Poles, enlarging their trades into the West and East Indies: to the search of whose passage, that worthy Sea-captain Sir Martin Furbusher, made Saile into the North-East-Seas, farre further then any man before him had cuer done, giuing to these parts the name of Queene Elizabeths foreland.

(142) The next yeere hee attempted thirlic leagues further, when finding gould Ore (as was thought) and taking a man, woman, and Child, of the Sauage Calayases, he returned into England; but as his gold procured dross, so the liued not long, neither turned that discouery to any great profit, though it was againe the third time assailed by himselfe, and since by other most famous Navigators; the North-west by Englishmen being lately descried, to bee Seas more saie, and the passage of farre better hope.

(143) Among these Sea-worthies our famous Vlisses, Sir Francis Drake is the first in the rancke, who the yeere of Christ Iesus 1577 and fiftenth of November set saile from Plimmouth in a Fleete of five ships, and one hundred, sixty foure men, who hauing put of Cape de Verd, in the beginning of February, he law no land, till the fifth of April following, being past the line, thirte three degrees of latitude, in the 36. degree entred the Riuer Plate; whence hee fell with the straites of Magellan the one and twentie of August, which with three of his ships hee passed, hauing cast-off the other two as impediments vnto him, and the Mariagold tossed from her Generall after passage, was no more seene; but the other whereof Master Iohn Winter was Captaine, shaken allo off by tempest, returned through the straites, and recovered England; only the Pellican wherof himselfe was Admirall, held on her course to Chily, Conquimbo, Cinmano, Palma, Zima, vpon the West of America, where hee passed the line the first day of March, and so forth till he came to the Latitude 47. thinking by those North-Seas to haue found passage to England. But fogs, frosts and cold winde forced him to turne his Course South-West from thence, and came to anchor 38. degrees from the line, where the King of that Countrey presented vnto him his networke Crowne of many coloured feathers, and relictenth therewith his Scepter of gouernement vnto his deuotion, his people so admiring our men that they sacrificed vnto them, as to their Gods. This place (for the glory of England, he named Nova Albion according to her ancient name; and at his departure areared a Monument to witness what there had bene done, which was a plate of brasie fixed in an eminent place, wherein was engrauen her Maiefties name, and her right to that prouince, as freely giuen vnto her deputy both by King and people. Wherein also was written the yeere and day of their entrance, and of the lands deuourance; vnder which plate he put her Maiefties picture and armes in a peece of Siluer to retaine the memory of this seruice vnto posteritie. From thence the fourteenth of November he fell with Ternate one of the Iles of Maluco, being curteously entertained of the King, and from thence he came vnto the Iles of Celebes, to Iaua Maior, to the Cape Buena Speranza, and fell with the Coasts of Guinea, whence crossing againe the line, he came to the height of the Azores, and thence into England vpon the third of November and yeere of Saluation 1580. after he had bene at Sea with such fortunate successe the space of three yeeres lacking twelue daies. The small vessel wherein this admirable voyage was performed, was, at her Maiefties commandement, laid vp in the docke besides Deepesford, where it remaineth as a monument of Englands great fame, vnto this day; and the worthy Generall honoured with Knighthood, being the first that by trauell encompassed the Earth, and law the wondrous workes of God in those great deepes.

(144) The Seas thus knowne, our Merchants began to trade with the Moscovits, and Turkes, whose priuiledge for Traffike the Great Sallim sent them, confirmed vnder his Regall Seale, and at her Ambassadors request (without direction from her Maieftie) made peace with the King of Poland, as by his own letters sent vnto our Queene is apparent; the Coppy whereof being deliuered vnto mee by him who had bene Deputy Ambassador in Constantinople, I haue here inserted, translated word for word, as followeth.

The Sultan Murahit his letters to her Maieftie.

(145) Most glorious and in brightnes most blessed woman, and of women the chiefe Prince of the mighty followers of Iesus. Queene of the most famous Kingdome of England, most excellent Elizabeth, most sapient Governesse of all the affaires of thy people, and famitie of the Nazaries, the most pleasaunt Spring of brightnesse and glorie, the most acceptable cloude sweet (bowers, the beire and Lady of perpetual happinesse, and blessednesse, of the most famous Kingdome of England, to whom all distressed soules doe flocke for reliefe. Wee wishing from God the mighty Creator a most fortunate increase of all the affaires of your excellency and happy successe; and offering eternall vowe and praises worthy of our mutuall and perpetual familiarity and league, and declaring the premises, and that which followeth with singular decemise: Wee giue you to understand most friendly, that certaine yeeres passed we had continuall wars with Casuals Prince of Perfia, in right of our people, by reason whereof we would not make warre vpon other parts, whereby certaine theemes in the parts of Polonia, called Calakes, and other wicked persons lurking in those confines, daily troubled and grieved our Subiects: now the Perlian being vanquished, and by the power of the Almighty Creator, matters in those parts being compounded, we determined to punish the said persons lurking in Poland, and other parts; and by the Belgerby of Greece our Army being joined, and sent with our charge by a Prince of Tartaria, in the yeere last passed, a part of the Kingdome of Polonia, was on our behalfe troubled, and waisted, and the said Calakes, and other wicked persons were punished according to their deserts, which the King of Poland seeing, and sending two messengers to our blessed Port, to inquire, finde out, and punish in full punishment, signified so much vnto vs, and required our acceptation of his presents; but we would not allow his petition, but had fully determined againe to send our Army against the said King of Poland; but the Ambassador of your Maiefty remaining in our blessed Port, interposing himselfe, and signifying that he did asist your excellency, with Corne, Gun-powder, Mass, and other things, necessary for warre, out of the confines of Polonia; now when as the Kingdome of Polonia by our meanes was troubled, and your Ambassador declared vnto vs your singular and peculiar pleasure, the same his declaration and intercession was vnto vs gratefull and acceptable, and your excellency to whom we owe all fauours and honour. Wee wrote our letters to the King of Polonia on this manner; that the said factious wicked persons and Calakes should be found out and fully punished, but if on the behalfe of your Maiefty, a louing league of peace had not bin solicited for the King of Poland, we would not by any meanes haue entred League with him, but only at your request we haue shewed this grace to the said King and his Subiects, and for our familiarity is mutuall and perpetual, we thinke it convenient that your Maiefty joining your selfe with the Kingdome of Polonia, doe not leaue to continue warre with the King of Spain, who so long time hath kept warre against you; and if your Maiefty be not grieved to write vnto vs by some trusty man, we vowe, by the aide of the Omnipotent Creator, that all necessary things shall bee on our part furnished and ordered, that a speedy dispatch may be made into Spain, wherein for our parts no assistance shall be wanting, whereof you may nothing doubt. Given in our Royall Seat at Constantinople in the yeere of Iesus. 1590. and of our Prophet Mahomet, 998. in the moneth called Sadele, the xij.

But from these farre trauels, long, and chargeable adventures, let vs returne to our neerer home proceedings vnder the Gouernment of our prudent Queene Sheba.

(146) Gregory of that name the thirteenth, and stout stirring man of Rome, seeing Pope Pius his thunderbolts fall short of the marke whereunto they were aimed, thought it necessary to raise that begun foundation (though with ill burnt bricke, and bad tempered mortar) as that his mounted Canons from the height, might reach and command where the other had left: To which purpose hee solicited Philip King of Spaine, after his fortunes had set him in Portingall Anno 1582 to undertake warre against Queene Elizabeth either directly or vnderhand, in fauour of the Irish Rebels, vnto which charge he offered not only his holy blessing, and spirituall treasure, but also to acquit him of the fruites of the Archbishopricke of Toledo, long retained in his hands, whilst the Archbishop remained suspended, and the King receiued some millions of Crownes, which the Pope claimed to belong vnto the See of Rome. But Philip not yet ready to attempt vpon England, joined with him for the Conquest of Ireland; the one, sending fixe hundred men vnder the command of Thomas Stukeley, whom he had lately filled Marquisse of Ireland, (a profuse and defamed person throughout all Christendome, flying out of England, for his many Piracies, and now imploied to follow the consecrated Standard of the Church;) the other, bearing all the charge with an addition of three hundred Spaniards; sending money with them to wage foure thousand men more; and the more to kindle the flames of Rebellions, Doctor Sanders (the Arch-Rebell and English Fugitiue) was sent from the Popes holy side.

(147) These landing in Ireland and Countie of Kerry, vpon a Promontory shooting it selfe into the west Sea, raised their consecrated standard, built their Fort Del-Ore, and with many threats gaue forth that the Country should shortly know wherefore they were come: and Desmond, a man desperate to euill, put in action by papall authoritie, had laid his hopes no lower (by these aides now arrived) then presently to become the sole King of Ireland, as Benhadad boasted ouer Ifrail before his harnessse was put on.

(148) To salute this puppet King, and to welcome these papals with such entertainment as his martiall sword would allow, Arthur Lord Grey Baron of Wilton, then Deputie of Ireland, halted to Dingle, and so to Del-Ore, where hee had them to so sharpe a banquet, that all the Spaniards, Italians, and Biscayes, notwithstanding their bragging brauadoes yielded their weapons at the first brunt, and vpon the points of the aduersaries died without mercy, the Captaines, Coronell, Secretary and few more referred for ranfome. The Fore they had stored with money, Bifket, Bacon, Oile and wine, sufficient to hold out the space of fixe moneths, and furnished with powder, thor, and armour sufficiently for two thousand men: with them all the Irish as well women as men died; and Desmond driuen into extreme want, fearing the prick of euery thorne, and the shadow of euery bulle, notwithstanding hee was armed with an Agnus Dei, and an enchanted ring sent from the Popes owne finger hung about his necke, yet could hee not keepe his traitorous head vpon his shoulders; when like a wolfe wandering in the woods for his pray, was in a poore Cottage wounded by a souldier rushing in vpon him, and being knowne was presently cut shorter by the head. But with his ende, ended not the troubles of Ireland, especially those parts of Ylster, that lay most remote from England.

(149) And whereunto, Walter Earle of Essex, accompanied with the Lord Rich, and others, had formerly made an expedition, as well to reduce those wilde Irish vnto a more ciuill life and respectiue obedience vnto the English Crowne, as to winne them to the knowledge of Christ, whom they most ignorantly worshipped. But the death of this Noble man hapning before his intendments could bee accomplished, left that to be followed by others which himselfe had begun.

(150) The troubles of which Prouince hee partly touched vnto the death of Shan O-Neale, whose seignories by Parliament were inuected into the Queenes hands, and a Law enacted, that from thence forth no man should assume the name or title of O-Neale. After which some small blaies of peace breathed vpon those parts; till shortly Turlough Leinigh, a brothers son of Con-More the Grandfather of this Shan, by a popular election tooke that stile vpon him, a man steep farre in yeeres which made him more quiet, and much the rather for feare of Shan O-Neales lonnes, but especially of Hugh Baron of Dungannon the sonne of Bastard Mathew, vnto whom hee had giuen his daughter in Marriage, and the said Baron had lately repudiated and cast off.

(151) This Turlough was most obsequious and seruiceable to Queene Elizabeth, stirring no troubles to the English, though to his neighbours the Irish hee proued most sterne: For, O-Donnell hee disquieted, the Scots of the Ilands hee molested, and in an encounter slew Alexander Ogethe the slayer of Shan O-Neale, and indeed became so fearefull, that his sonne in law Hugh, lay hid from him in his owne Country, and lastly escaped his hands into England: where to raise himselfe from his obscure estate and condition hee got command of a troupe of Horse, with a pension of a thousand markes by yeere from the Queene. Whose seruice against the Rebellions of Desmond, was so well performed and accepted, that hee obtained the place and title of Earle of Tir-Oen, pleading the Letters patent of King Henry the eight granted to his Grandfather, and his heires males, whereof himselfe was the sonne of Mathew created Baron of Dungannon by the same King. Thus growne vnto greatnesse, old Turlough vpon certaine conditions conditions resigned vnto him the Government of Vlster where thorowly cōbining himselfe with the men of most might, they together associated their strenghts to defend the Romish religion, for that was the mantle that euer conuered their hatched rebellions.

(152) The first Champion that founded the Alarum was Mac-Guyre a man of a turbulent spirit, thrust forward by Guaran a Priest, whom Pope Vrbane the second had ordained Primate of Ireland, commanding him in the name of God to fight there the Lords Battaile, assuring him by his Apostolicall warrant, of most fortunate proceedings and happy successe. But see how this great Prophet was deceived; for by the valour of St. Richard Bingham, Mac-Guyre was discomfited, and the primate Priest slaine in the field.

(153) The Confederacy thus broken, Mac-Guyre let himselfe for open rebellion; whom Tir-Oen in shew of his dutifull obedience pursued, and was so forward in seruice, that hee receiued a wound in his thigh to his no little honour. Whereupon he became of greater respect in the Englishe Court, and more enhaunsed in his owne esteeme; so that hee feared not to exhibite Complaints against the Lord Deputy St. William Fitz-Williams, the Marshall whose sister hee had married, and the Garrisons soldiers that garded those parts. But the Deputy recalled, and St. William Russel appointed in his place; as if all quarrels had bene quite forgotten, he came vnto the new Lord Deputy, and exhibited an humble submission vpon his knees, wherein hee dolefully expressed his inward griefe, in that her Maiefty had conceived some indignation against him. His abetting himselfe from the State, he confessed was disagreeable to his obedience, albeit to be somewhat excused by the hard measure (as he alleged) of the late Deputy, and Marshall that were combined for his destruction. Hee acknowledged that the Queenes Maiefty had advanced him in title, dignity and great liuings, and himselfe vnworthy of any, but rather dishonour and ruine, if he should become vngratefull vnto so good a Prince. With these and the like complement of his true heart and meaning, hee posselt the Counsell of Ireland, that albeit St. Henry Bagnall the Marshall was present, and charged him with many barbarous of Mac-Guyre, the Primate, the beseege of Imis-Kellin and others, hee was by them dismissed and sent home, to the great discontent of the Queene and disquietnesse of the Land, as afterward followed, and in course of time and story shall be declared.

(154) Long before these last Irish troubles, (as you may obserue in the relation of some former attempts against the Queene) the brands of dissention were blowne vnto flames, betwixt Queene Elizabeth of England and Philip the Second of that name King of Spain; whose first breaking-faith was in the Netherlanders cause, the one persecuting, and the other defending the religion that those people profest and thus it began in the yeere of Grace, 1575. Don Lewis, gouernour of those Low Countreys for the said King, sent his Agent vnto Queene Elizabeth, desiring her to banish such of them as repaired to England, onely their flight, and their religion all the cause alleged against them.

(155) Her answer was short and nothing acceptable, that she held it vnworthy the Maiefty of a Prince to chaffe away those poore exiled and scattered Netherlanders, that were fled into her Dominions, for the safety of their liues, and to auoid the Spanishe tyranny, exercised onely in case of their consciences. And yet the forbad some men of speciall note, as also such as bare Armes, to enter England, vpon condition that Westmorland should be banished the Low Countreys with such other Rebels as had fled to the Spaniards. But the Clergy intending to bring their Spanishe Inquisition into those parts, the Prince of Orange entred conference with the States of Holland and Zeland, touching the defence of their professed religion, and the preservation of their distressed Countreys, vnable of themselves (as was alleged) long to defend themselves, and therefore it was thought fittest to chooe them a Protector.

(156) This passing for currant among the Counsellors of estate, three were in name, the Emperour, the French King, and the Queene of England; for they were past all hope of any alliance with Spain. Yea of these in choice, some excepted against, as neither safe nor conuenient to be yielded vnto. Against the Empire was alleged the diuersities of religion, the small vnion of those Germane Princes, and hauing their hands full to keepe their owne at home, would bee the lesse able to assist with helpe abroad. The French (they feared) had wasted their money the onely meanes for warre) with their owne ciuill dissentions; if not, yet might they hardly be trusted, as witnessed the cruell massacre lately committed. England then was the Pillar to which they must leane; their Queene the greatest of all Christian Princes, their Navy the Commandresse of the Seas, and their people professing the same Religion with them, the furest band of Christian society: further it was alleged that the Realmes of Denmarke and Sweden desired it, the County of Emden and the Hanse Townes in the East intreated for it, Brabant and Flanders sought it; yea and the rightfull Title of the Princes Elizabeth, iustified from the Earles of Holland and Zeland by the Lady Philip, daughter to William the third of that name, Earle of Henault and Holland, did warrant it.

(157) Thus then concluded, the States were sent vnto England, and made the end of their coming knowne to the Queene; who wisely weighing into what a Labyrinth shee should enter, fought rather the safety of her owne, then to consent to their motion; for Spain shee well knew would storme at the vnion, and France bee in great iealousie to haue such a neighbour; shee therefore promising to bee a mediator vnto the King of Spain for their peace; and after some complements of Princely entertainments with thanks for their offer, and licence to carry with them many voluntary English soldiers, let them depart; whose denial made knowne, was nothing welcome to those distressed Princes.

(158) Longafter that, Lewis the Gouernour liued not, whom Don Iohn of Austria (base brother to King Philip) succeeded, who at first made shew of most fauourable affection, yet so, as vrging their subiection to Spain; and obedience to the Apostolicall See of Rome. Neither would hee come to their Counsell, without Hostages deliuered, and most of their troups to guard his suspecting person, esteeming them Lutherans and Heretikes, in whom was no trust.

(159) These moued the States once more to sue vnto her Maiefty, that by her meanes, with peace they might enioy the ancient Priuileges of their Princes, and the freedom of their owne consciences against the Inquisition and Tyranny of Spain; and indeede so lamentably deplored their case, that the pity-full Queene sent into Spain, to desire the King in commiseration to withdrawe these extremities from the distressed. But Philip deafe on that eare, and Iohn planting his Garrisons with suspicious intents, Elizabeth began to looke to the maine, sending the King word, shee liked not that his Soldiers should bee her bad neighbours, and the Gouernour notice that shee would not suffer the Christian Netherlanders to be tyrannized by his Spaniards. And thereupon caused the value of forty thousand Angells in Bullion, vnmined (in part of an hundred thousand pound sterling promised) to bee sent vnto Brussels, receiuing the States obligations for the same; where also were confirmed certaine conditions betwixt her and them.

(160) This moued Don Iohn to such conceits, that he intended to doe wonders in England, by interterposing himselfe in the Scottish affaires, yea, and by the destruction of Queene Elizabeth, whereto hee is said to haue got the Popes good furtherance. But whether by poison or discontents this great conceited Monarch left the Crowne of England where it gloriously stood, and laid his owne head in the graue of death.

(161) And indeede so glorious was Elizabeths fame, growne now more potent by the Low Countreys engagements, that the wife Statist of France, feared their owne Starre would be dimmed at the presence of her bright Sunne. For Henry their King, though he made great shewes to doe much, both in the Church and Counsell of State; in feasts, in masks, and in treading the measures of dances, dallied out both day and night in vnmeasurable delights; And yet the Clergy to hold in their owne hands the raines of Church-gouernment, with Bels, Bookes, and Beads, founded forth the zeale of his religious piety in the cares of their auditories: And to manage all temporal affaires at their owne dispose, the Queen Mother, and the Guize laide loose the bridle in his owne necke, not abridging his pleasures with their grauer aduices. But left the English maiden Queene should bee a maule to the Churchmens Maffings, or disturbe these State-guiders by claime (as shee had done) of her owne right in France; the marriage motioned nine yeeres before, betwixt their Kings brother Francis Valois Duke of Anjou, and Elizabeth Englandes faire Queene, was againe solicited in hope by this match to make her wholly theirs, the better to establish their peace: & to effectually be the sure moued, and so acceptably heard of her Maiefty, that the Monsieur came on in person to wooe her himselfe: though to the little liking of many Nobles, and great discontent to the Commons, as (amongst other appearances) was made knowne by a booke written against it, for which (by reason of some personall and ouer-lauish passages) the Inditor lost his hand. But whether her Maiefty affected not marriage, or disliked the man, or else out of her tender care not to giue the least griefe, or distaste to her Subiects, after most Princely and magnificent entertainment shee let him depart without any promise of a nuptial knot.

(162) The fame of this Duke was very renowned, and much the more by the English Queenes fauours, in so much, that the distressed vnto Princes, after they had declared Philip of Austria (then King of Spain) by his too violent Government against their priuileges (whereunto hee had sworn) to be an enemy vnto their state and peace, and therefore vpon breach of couenants to haue fallen from his interest among them, chose this hopefull Monsieur to bee their Protector, as a Prince most powerfull to defend their cause; of whose triumphes and French treacheries there, let Serres and Petit report for me.

(163) He dying in France (penitent and sorrowfull for what hee had done), and William of Nassau Prince of Orange (by an Edict from Spain proclaimed a Traitor, his Lands and goods giuen to them that could bring him either dead or alieue, with a further reward of twenty five thousand Crownes annuall) was first dangerously wounded in the face with a Pistoll, and at last murdered with the like shor by the base hand of an odious traitor at his Court in Delfe in Holland; whereupon the oppressed Princes once more sued for reliefe, both to her Maiefty of England, as also vnto Henry the French King.

(164) Shee much disliking the cruelties of Spain, whose hands were thus dippt in the blood of this Prince, commended their cause vnto King Henry by an honorable Ambassage. But hee, finding himselfe ouermastered at home, and in danger of the Guize and the league; himselfe without forces, and theirs growne very strong; recommended their distressed vnto Queene Elizabeth by his owne Am-bassadour, promising her by the faith of a King, assistance for those Netherlanders reliefe: and the like request hee made vnto the King of Namur in their behalves. Hereupon their Procurators were sent into England, with full Commission to dispose of their Princes at the Queenes pleasure.

(165) Her Councell then assembled to conferre of the businesse, many wayty considerations amongst them were moued, and lastly concluded, that her Maiefty ought to accept of the offer. The defence of Gode Gospel was the first mouie the being the nursing mother of Christis distressed Saints; the Spanishe Inquisition, that without respect had persecuted her Subiects contrary to right, was too cruell to be tolerated; Philips Army with flying colours sent lately into Ireland vpon gift made vnto him by the Pope, with a purpose of the like enterprize for England, bewaried their intents and lastly the hard measure that was to bee expected for England, if the Spaniards seated in these neere Netherland Princes was to be prevented. These important reasons for her owne State, and pity of theirs, moued her Maiefty to become their Defender, but would in no wise take the Title of Soueraigne Lady thereof, which they would haue conferred vpon Her and her heires.

(166) And thereupon Articles being drawne, (to the number of thirty) Sir Iohn Norris (a renowned Marshall man) was appointed General of five thousand foote, and a thousand Horsemen English, all retained at her Maiefties pay during the laid warres; which monthly amounted to twelue thousand five hundred, twenty fixe pound sterling, accounting 56. dayes to the month, according to the Contract. For which monies so disbursed, the Townes of Flushing and Brill, with two Skonnes, and the Castell of Ramen in Holland, were deliuered to her Maiefties vic in pledge, vntill the money were repaid: these Couenants were dated at Nijmegen the tenth of August in Anno 1585.

(167) This Protection, vnderaken by the Queene of England, was very ill taken by King Philip of Spain; neither better digested by the Popes holy Father, as was shewed in two lying libels published against her: where amongst other things, shee was taxed with Ingratitude towards King Philip, who in the raigne of her sister, was said to haue saved her life, and that treacherously hee had sought the death of the Prince of Parma the present Gouernour in those parts vnder the said King: vnto which impudent flanders shee made answer in a booke printed both in English and French, shewing the shamefull vntruth of those impudorous liars, and the reasons that led her to assist those poore distressed States, whereof these were a part.

(168) The natural situation of those Countreys, lying directly opposite to England; the neerenesse, commodious hauens, and commerce of these people with the English, euen when they were scurall, and not yet vnited together, as of late yeeres they haue bene, by inter-marriages, and reduced vnder the Governments of the Lords that succeeded in the Dukedome of Burgundy; betwixt whom and the English Kings, hath bene a continuall league; as also betwixt the natural Subiects of both Countreys, both of commerce for Merchants, as all other speciall bonds of mutuall amity. For testimony of which, there are extant sundry Authentique treaties and transactions for mutuall commerce, intercourse and fraire amity of ancient times; as betwixt King Henry the sixth, and Philip the Second Duke of Burgundy; which was renewed by Duke Charles his sonne (Father to the King of Spaines Grand-mother, and husband to the Lady Margaret, sister to King Edward the fourth) and againe confirmed by King Henry the seventh and the Arch-Duke Philip, Grand-father to the King of Spain. And of later yeeres betwixt King Henry the eighth, and Charles the fifth, Emperour of Aleman, Father to Philip now King in affilting K. Philip, who was made the whip in his Holiness hand, & the Duke of Parma appointed the chiefe Commander in that action, which Booke (fraught with all impudency of diuillish slanders against her sacred person) was printed at Antwerp in Anno 1588.

(188) This Bull and Booke coming to the Queenes knowledge; the sent vnto Parma (who had gained the reputation of some Princely vertues) to deale plainly with her; if so, then meant she no longer to continue the treaty of peace: but he with many Court-like complements denied his authority, neither had seene (as hee said) any such precripts. Moreouer the English Commissioners pressed the conditions, purposely to finde some footsteps of this clove-carried designe, when at last it burst forth in these termes, that the King of Spaine had kept fifty thousand men in pay almost a whole yeere to lie still and doe nothing; to his great charge by the meanes of that treaty. At which very instant, these their hidden traps and royalties apparently shewed themselves, when the Seas were turmented with such a Nauy of ships, as her swelling waues could hardly be seene, and the Flagges, Streamers, and Ensignes, so spread in the winde, that they seemed to darken euen the Sunne, which put the English Commissioners in some suspition and feare, hauing no hostages for their safe returne.

(189) This Inuincible Nauy long in preparing, and now in a readinesse, was furnished with all prouisions of warres, and with many brauadoes spread their failles for Englands inuasion, guided by the Prouinciall Generalls, whose names, the numbers of Vessels, Ordinances, Sallers, Souldiers, and Slaues, as I finde them recorded, in this ensuing Table are inserted.

(190) Admirable (as yee see) was the prouision of this mighty Armado, and so confident was the Spaniard that England should pay the whole shot, that no cost of any thing was at all spared; of bullets for great shot were two hundred and twenty thousand; of powder four thousand and two hundred kintals, every kintall containing a hundred weight; of lead for bullets one thousand kintals; and one thousand and two hundred kintals of match; seven thousand muskets and callers; tenne thousand partizans and halberds; with murdering peeces, double Canons, and field peeces for campe; with store of furniture for carriages, Mules and Horses, so that they were sufficiently provided both for sea and land. Bread and bisket was baked and wine laid aboard for fixe monethes prouision; fixe thousand and five hundred kintals of bacon; three thousand of cheefe, besides flesh, rice, beanes, pease, oyle and vinegar, with twelue thousand pipes of fresh water, store they had of torches, lanthornes, and lampes, canaus, hides and lead to stop leakes, whips, and butcherly kniues; for what vfe wee may imagine. In a word by the report of Don Diego Pimentell, the army was two and thirty thousand strong and cost the King of Spaine thirty thousand ducats euery day.

(191) In this army were five regiments of old Spanish souldiers, of the Tercios, of Naples, Sicily, and the Terceraes, commanded by five Masters Del Campo; the first was Don Diego de Pimentel a Knight of the order of St. John, brother to the Marquess of Taueras, and couento to the Earle of Benenent and Calui: the second Colonel was Don Francisco de Toledo brother to the Earle of Orgas: the third, Don Alonso de Luxon: the fourth Don Nicholas de Isla or Patrio Anselmo: and the fifth was Augustin Mexia brother to the Marquess of la Garde who was afterwards made Gouverneur of Antwerp; each company hauing in his regiment two and thirty companies, besides the Castilians and Portugall bands, each of them hauing their peculiar gouerners, captaines, officers, colours and weapons.

(192) The Generall of this mighty army was Don Lodouicus Perez Duke of Medina Sidonia, Baron of Saint Lucar, of the Order of the Gold Fleece. The Admirall was Don John Martinez de Richald, the Marshall Don Francisco Bonadilla: and the chiefe Counsellors for the warre were Diego Pimentell, Floris de Valdez, Pedro de Valdez, Michael Oquendo, Don Alonso de Liera, Don Diego Maldonado, and Don George Mariquez. Don Martin Alcon was ordained Vicar Generall for the holy Inquisition, in whose traine were a hundred Monkes and Iesuits; and Cardinall Allen was appointed the Superintendent of all Ecclesiasticall matters throughout England; who fearing to bee ouertaken with time, translated Pope Sixtus his Bull into English, that it might bee the sooner published vpon the arriual of the Spanish Fleet into that Kingdome. Of voluntary aduenturers were an hundred twenty foure Noble men, and and Gentlemen of great account; all of them furnished at their owne charges; among whome was the Prince of Afcoli, Alonso de Leina, the Marquess of Pennafiel, the Marquess of Ganes, the Marquess of Berlanga, the Count de Paredes, the Count de Teluaz, and diuers other Marquesses and Earles of Honourable Families of Mendoza, Toledo, Pacheco, Cordoues, Guzman, and Manriquez; neither was there any Noble house of Spaine, but had a sonne, brother or Nephew in the voyage, in hope of reuenues and riches in England.

(193) Neither was the Duke of Parma slacke in the businesse, who lying in readinesse to ioyne his forces with this Nauie, let many thousands on work to build ships, to digge and deepen riuers for saile from Antwerp to Guant, and to Bruges, lading three hundred small boates with munition and victuals; as also prepared seauenty others flat bottomde, euery one able to beare thirty hoises for transportation, with Bridges ready made to shippe and vnshippethem. Two hundred more were made of the like fashon, though not so bigge, and lay ready in the Hauens of Newport; at Dunkirke lay thirtie seauen shippes of warre, wherein store of pyles were bestowed, sharpened at the end with yron pykes, to pile vp the mouthes of riuers; and at Graveling hee had provided twenty thousand empty Casks, with Cords and other furniture fite to make floating Bridges to stoppe vp the Hauens. He likewise had shipped great abundance of Saddles, Bridles, with all other furniture for horse; and horses also for carriage, with Ordinance, and other prouisions of warre.

(194) Neere vnto Newport hee had lying vnder the command of Camillo, thirty Companies of Italians, two of Wallons, and eight of Burguinois, euery Company being an hundred men. At Dyxmen hee mustered foure score Companies of Netherlanders, threescore of Spaniards, threescore of high Dutch, and seauen of rebellious fugitiue English, whereof Sir William Stanley was Generall; at Corricke also were foure thousand lodged, and at Watene nine hundred horse, ouer whom the Marquess of Guast was Commander. And to this Land-seruice came the Duke of Pastrana, supposed to bee the Spanish Kings balconie; the Marquess of Bourgon, one of the Archduke Ferdinands sonnes, Don Vespasian Gonzaga of the house of Mantua, a great Souldier, who had bene Viceroy of Spaine, Don John de Medici Baltard of Florence, Don Amedeus Baltard of Sauey, with many others of the like estate.

(195) Neither must you think that Sixtus Quintus the Pope of Rome, did in any wise neglect his diligence and deuotion to this intended inuasion; whose helping hand was shewed in sending forth his Crusado (as hath bene vied against the Turkes) and publishing a safe passport for his Philippians to enter into England. Who also for the furtherance of the enterprise, undertooke to contribute a million of gold, the halfe presently, and the other when any notable Haven in that land should be wonne; with this promise notwithstanding (most wisely inserted) that hee should hold the English Crowne as feudatorie vnto the See of Rome; in earnest whereof, hee bestowed vpon him his Apostolicall benediction, and the Title of the Defendour of the Faith, so liberall was hee, both in his temporall and spirituall largesses, and so forward was Philip to catch at Elizabeths still flourishing Crowne: but her vndanted heart in this present danger, as another Ezekiah, fought vnto the Lord, whose annointed seruant shee was, and who euer had bene her onlie defendand. And for preventing those long threatned stormes, hee sent Charles Howard Lord Baron of Effingham, high Admirall of England, vnto the Seas, where the Lord Henry Seymer kept betwixt Callis and Douer, seconded by the Ships of the vntited Prinonices, in league with the Queene.

(196) The French King who euer honoured & admired Queen Elizabeth great and gracions vertues, hauing more particular intelligences that this great preparation was made against England; gaue speedy & secret notice thereof to her Maicesty, whereupon hee commaunded the generall forces of the Realme in their feuerall shires to bee mustred, trained, and put in readinesse for the defence of the whole; which accordingly was done; and whereof the Lord Robert Dudley Earle of Leicefer, and Steward of her Household was appointed Lieutenant. Tilbury in Essex was the place for the Campe, whereunto were appointed 500. horsemen, and twentie thousand of foot, and to guard her Maicesties person, out of the feuerall Counties of the West, East, and South parts of England, were selected twothousand, three hundred, fifty two horsemen, and thirty foure thousand and fifty of foot, her selfe in courage farre surmounting her sex; as another Zenobia, or rather Deborah, lead forth the Lordes host against this great Sifera, and her souldiers valiant for warre, and apt for battell, men skilfull to handle speare and shield, both for courage and quicke dispatch, might well be compared vnto those Gadites that came to aide David, whose faces were like to the faces of Lions, and were compared to Roes in the mountains for swiftness.

(197) The Inuincible Nauie, and terror of Europe, as the Papals both feared, and took to bee, hauing all things prepared, loosed Anchor from Lisbon vpon the nineteenth of May, and made vnto the Groine in Gallicia, it being the neereft Haven to England, whence hoysing sayles with great hope and pride, bent their courie thitherward; but suddenly the heauens hating such holie actions, powdered downe reuenge, by a fore and v unexpected tempest, which draue the Duke of Medina, the chiefe Generall backe againe into the Groines; eight other of their shippes being dispersed on leas, their masts broken and blowne ouer-board; besides three Portugall Gallies which fell vpon the Coast of Bayon in France, and were set vpon by their owne slaues, whereof David Gwyn an Englishman was the first, who with his fellowes both French and Turkes freed themselves by the slaughter of many Spaniards, among whome Don Diego de Alandran was one.

(198) Charles Howard Lord Admirall hearing for certaine that their Fleet was ready to hoise vp their sailles, had sent the worthy Sir Francis Drake, who was constituted his Vice-Admirall, vnto the West parts, with fifty six shippes well appointed, whither him selfe also following with speed, and ioyning his Fleet, their number amounted to one hundred shippes, whereof fiftene were Victuallers, and nine Voluntaries of Devonshire Gentlemen; many a seruiceable man returning backe for lacke of imployment or place. These from Plymouth refolowing and affaying to put forth to seas, were to meet with the wind; that past the sylles they could not attain, and thence also were forced by tempest into the Haucn, from whence they lanchd to refresh their ships and companies; where lying at Anker, the scouts at Sea had descryed some sayles of the Spaniards, which had bene likewise distressed by the stormes; but before these could bee haled, the wind came about, and brought them to the Groine, where the rest lay in harbour.

(199) Intelligence spreading that the Spaniards were in want; their great shippes dispersed, the rest storme-shaken, and their men by multitudes slaine with the plague; the Lord Admirall meant to vie the aduantage vpon the first North wind, which came about the eight day of Iuly, and bare his sayle almost within sight of Spaine, when suddenly it changing into the South, and hee wisely foreseeing, that the enemy might passe without his discouerie, that the Seas might bee stormy, and his Fleet wind-bound, and that whilst they thus lay abroad, their service much better might be employed at home, hee therefore presently returned, and ankered his Fleet in the Haven of Plymouth, suffering his men to relieue themselves on land.

(200) But the Spaniards ships new rigged, and their wants supplied, their King still hore on his former resolutions, instantly vrged and hastened his Chieftaines to put againe to Sea, which accordingly was done vpon the eleuenth of Iuly, waying their Ankers at the Groin, where with braue flues and full sailes they came into the Channels of the narrow Seas, where they cast anker, and dispatched certaine small pinnasses vnto the Duke of Parma, to signifie their arrival and readines, and to command him in the name of the King to forward his charge for that service.

(201) The English Fleet being in harbour, and many men on shore, Captain Thomas Fleming (some say a Pirate) discried the Spaniard vpon the point of the Lizard, the wind being then South and by West: He hastening to Plymouth, made relation thereof vnto the Lord Admirall, the newes was more fearefull, for that it was sodaine, the Queene having received intelligence for certaine, that this great Armado would not come forth that yeere, their bulkes being so dispersed and bruised, and their wants and sicknesse so great, vpon which rash reports (a dangerous matter in State-affaires), so confident she was, that shee felt for foure of her tallest roiall shippes, to bee brought againe vnto Chatham; but Flemings vnexpected discouery hindred that purpose, and all hands were set on work to warpe out the Shippes, the winde blowing harde, and hindering the same.

(202) The next day about noone, this terrible Fleet was delcied by the English, who with a South west wind came forward amaine, and (as seemed) they made for Plymouth. But whether their Commission were otherwise, or for that they saw the English shippes out of the harbour, they passed by, towards Callis, well hoping about those coasts to meet with Prince Parma, by whose waisting that way the English got the wind, and effoons gaue them chase, and encounter, where fire, smoake and echoing Canons beganne the parley, and bullets most freeleie enterchanged betwixt them, were messengers of each others mind.

(203) The next day the two Fleetes fought within Musket shot, where the English Admirall fell most hotely on the Vice-Admirall of Spaine, at which present they well perceived their owne over-fights; their great shippes (like Castles) powerful to defend, but not offend, to stand but not to moue, and therefore farre vnfit for fight in those narrow seas: their enemies nimble, and ready at all sides to annoy them, and as apt to escape harme themselves, by being low built, and easily hore out. Therefore they gathered themselves close in forme of a halfe Moone, and slackened their sailes, that their whole Fleet might keepe together. Notwithstanding, one of their great Gallions, wherein was Don Pedro de Valdez, Valsques de Silva, Alonso de Sayas, and other Noblemen, was fore battered by the English shot, in auoiding whereof hee fell fowle vpon another shippe, and ere shee could be cleared, had her fore-mast broken off, which so hindred her saile, that shee was vnable to keepe way with the Fleet, nor they of courage to succour these Lords, but left both shippe and them, in this sudden and vnlooked for distresse. But night coming on, and shee lagging behind, the Lord Admirall supposing neither men nor Mariners to be left within board, and fearing to loose sight of the Spaniards, putt by, and followed the Lanthorne, which hee tooke to be borne by Sir Francis Drake, but that renowned Knight, busied vpon five great hulkes pursued them amaine, which being haled, were found to be Easterlings, & therupon freed from his further harmes.

(204) The next day following, Sir Francis Drake

espying this lagging Gallion, sent forth a Pinnasse to command them to yeelde, otherwile his Bulletes should force them without further fauour; but Valdez, to seeme valorous answered, that they were foure hundred and fifty strong, that himselfe was Don Pedro, and stood on his honour, therupon propounding certaine conditions. But the Knight sent his reply, that hee had not leisure to parley, if hee would yeeld, presently doe it, if not hee should well proue that Drake was no daftard; whereupon Pedro hearing that it was the fiery Drake (euer terrible to the Spaniards) who had him in chafe with forty of his followers came on board Sir Francis his shippe; where first giuing him the Conge, he protested, that hee and all his were resolu'd to die in defence, had they not fallen vnder his power, whose valour and felicity was so great, that Mars and Neptune seemed to attend him in his attempts, & whose generous mind towards the vanquished, had often bene experienced, euen of his greatest foes. Sir Francis requiting his Spanish complements with honourable English curtseys, placed him at his owne Table, and lodged him in his owne Cabbin. The residue of that company were sent vnto Plymouth, where they remained eighteene monethes, till their ransomes were paid; but Sir Francis his souldiers had well paid themselves with the spoile of the shippe, wherein were fifty five thousand Ducats in gold, which they shared merlie among them. The same day Michael de Oquendo Admirall to the Squadron Gaspulco, and Vice-Admirall to the whole Fleet, suffered no lesse disaster, whose ship being one of the greatest Gallions, fell suddenly on fire, all the vpper part of the shippe, and most of the persons therein consumed, howbeit the Gunpowder in the hold was all saved, and the rest of the scorched Spaniards with the hulke brought into Plymouth, to the great joy of the beholders.

(205) Vpon Tuesday the twenty third of Iuly, the Spaniards approaching right against Portland, the wind came about into the North, as fit as could bee withstood to further their designs; but the English agill, and foreseeing all harmes, recouered the aduantage thereof from the Spaniards, and continued that day from morning till night, in battering those vast wooden Castles with shot both great and small, which forced them for their further safety, to gather themselves close into a roundell, their best and greatest ships standing without, & securing the battered and lesse. On this day the hardest fight was performed: wherein, besides other remarkable harmes, a great Venetian shippe with some other smaller, were surpris'd, and taken by the English.

(206) The foure and twenty day of this present Moneth, the fight was onely betweene the foure great Galliaffes, and the English ships, the Spaniards hauing the aduantage, theirs being towed, and our sailes vnfil'd, by reason of the calme, which notwithstanding they fore galled the enemy with chaine shot, therewith cutting a sunder their tacklings, cables, and cordage to their no litle annoyance. But wanting powder, which so freely they had spent, they sent men on land for a further supply, which ministered dislikes (if not suspitions) to many, that wee should thus want vpon our owne coasts. In which Interim, a Council was called, wherein it was decreed that the English Fleet should be diuided into foure squadrons, and those committed to foure worthy Captaines, and most skillfull Navigators, whereof the Admirall in the Arke Royall was chiefe, Sir Francis Drake in the Revenge led the second, Captaine Hawkins the third, and Captaine Frobisher the fourth. Other most valiant Captaines there were in her Maiesties Shippes, as the Honourable Lord Thomas Howard in the Lion, the Lord Sheffield in the Beare, Sir Robert Southwell in the Elizabeth Jonas, Captain Baker in the Victory, and Captaine George Fenner in the Calson Leiceffer.

ards were attired against the Isle of Wight, where was a terrible encounter, each shooting off their whole sides, and not about six score yards the one from the other, till at length the English so battered the Spanish high Turrets, that they were forced once more to secure themselves in a roundell, and the foresaid Generalls so worthily bare themselves in this conflict, that the Lord Admirall bestowed the Order of Knight-hood vpon the Lords Howard and Sheffield, Master John Hawkins, Martin Frobisher, and others. And yet (by the Spanish brags) a false rumour was spread in France, that England was wholly conquered by the Spaniard.

(208) Their Fleet making forward about Sun-set, the 27. of the same moneth, came against Dunkerke, and ankered within sight of Callis, intending for Dunkerke, there to ioyne with the Duke of Parma his forces, without which, they well saw, they could doe nothing. The English Fleet following, vpon hard vpon them cast anker so neere, that they lay within Culuering shot. Where the Lord Henry Seymer vnited his to the Lord Admirals shippes. Meane-while the Duke of Medina sent vnto Parma, to bid him make ready his long expected forces; with which messengers many Noblemen of the Spaniards went on Land, among whom was the Prince of Ascoli the Kings base sonne, who so well liked his shipping, that hee made no great halt againe from shore: wherein he was onely fortunate; for that his Gallion was cast away vpon the Irish coast, and neuer returned to salute Spaine.

(209) Duke Parma hearing the best of this voyage, makes all things ready that lay in his charge; whose hopes were so fixed for Englands Conquest, that the glittering Diadem vpon Queene Elizabeths head, dazeled his ambitious eye, beeing assured by Cardinall Allen, that he was the man designed to bee crowned therewith, and who, from the Pope and Spaine should hold that Kingdome himselfe. Wherefore thinking his Coroner of the Low Countries Government, would but trouble the English Crowne, and both too weighty to be worn vpon one head, he committed that charge vnto Count Mansfeld the Elder, and making his vovs vnto Saint Mary of Hall in Henault, was already in conceit no lesse then a King. But loo the date of his raigne was expired, and his swelling tide fallen into a Low shallow ebbe; for the day following in his march towards Dunkerke hee heard the thundering Ordinance ring the passing peale of his stile and title, and the same euening had newes of the hard success of the Spaniards, the hoped aduancers of his dreamed fortunes.

(210) They lying the at anker nere Callis, to ioyne their powers with Parmas, were forced thence by a politike stratageme thus: Their Shippes, as Castles pitched in the seas, had their bulkes so planked with great beames, that bullets might strike and sticke, but neuer passe through, so that little auailed the English Canon, except onely in playing on their masts and tackling; whereupon, by her Maiesties aduise and appointment, eight of the English ships were discharged of men, and filled with gunpowder, pitch, brimstone, and other combustible matter; their Ordinance charged with bullets, stones, chaines, and the like, which vpon Sunday, the eight and twenty of Iuly, at two of the clocke after mid-night, were let driue with winde and tide among the Spanish Fleet, whose Pilots returning, and their traines taking fire, such a suddaine thunder-clap was giuen, that the Spaniards, affrighted in the dead of the night, were stricken into a horrible feare, least all their shippes should bee fired by these, which present mischief to auoide, in great perplexity, they hasted to cut their owne cables, the time beeing too short to weigh vp their ankers, and hoisting their sailes did driue at randome into the Seas, in which hast and confusion the greatest of their Galliaffes fell foule vpon another ship, and lost her Rudder, so that guidelesse the droue with the tide vpon a shelue in the shoare of Callis, where shee was assaulted by the English.

(211) This Galliaffe was of Naples; her General, Hugh de Moncado, who fought the more valiantly in hope of present relieue of the Prince of Parma; but Sir Amias Preston gaue so fierce an assault, that Moncado was shot dead with a bullet, and the Galliaffe boarded, wherein was many a Spaniard slaine, and a number of the rest leaping into the Sea, were drowned; yet Don Antonio de Matiques, a principall Officer, had the hap to escape; and was the first man that brought into Spaine the welcome of this now vincible Navy. This huge Bottomes, manned with foure hundred souldiers, and three hundred slaues, had in her also fifty thousand Ducats of the Spanish Kings treasure, a boory well fitting the English souldiers affections; who, hauing ranfacked all, and freed the slaues from their miserable fetters, went about to fit that vessel of Empittines on fire; but Monsieur Guendon, the gouernour of Callis, fearing some danger to the Towne or Haven, would not permit them, but discharged his ordinance against such as assailed it.

(212) The morning after this their miserable hap, ranging themselves againe into order, they approached ouer against Greueling, where once againe the English getting the winde, the Spanish were thereby deprived of the Conueniency of Callis roade, and kept from supply out of Dunkerke; in which port had rested their full hope of support. Notwithstanding they were forced to passe by, and so followed by the English, that their ships discharged vpon them from morning till night, the conflict prouing dimall to the inuincible Armado; for therein a great Gallion of Biscaie perished, the Captaine thereof to auoid ignominy, or to be accounted valorous, desperately slew each others, in which distresse also two other great ships presently sunke. The Saint Philip, and Saint Mathew, two Portugall Gallions, were so torn with shot, their tacklings spent, and their bulkes rent, that the water entred in on all sides; in the former of which, was Francis de Toledo, being Colonel ouer two and thirty bands, who taking his course for the Coast of Flanders, the leake was so great, that hee with others, committing themselves to the Skiffe, arrived at Offend, and the Ship, with the residue, were taken by the Englishers.

(213) In the Saint Mathew was embarked Don Diego Pimentelli, Campe-maister, and Colonel alio of thirty two bands; whose Shippe, though very strong, was so pierced with shot, that her Leakes could not be stopp'd, which knowne, the Duke of Medina sent his skiffe for him; and some others, to saue themselves from their imminent danger. But he, vpon a Spanish braue, refused so to doe, al-faying each way to free himselfe like a souldier; but not able to keepe saile with the Fleet, he forthwith made toward the coast of Flanders, where being espied by five men of warre, was met with, and required to yeeld, which lastly hee did vnto Captaine Peter Banderduesse; who carried him into Zealand, where, for a trophy of Victory, his Banner was hung vp in the Church of Leiden in Holland, whose length reached from the very rooffe vnto the ground: and another Ship of lesse burden coasting also for Flanders, was cast away on the sands.

(214) The Spaniards now finding their BENVENIDA vnto England far other then they expected, were content to couch their fleet close together, not seeking to assaile but to defend; and the winde comming to the South-west, in the same order passed by Dunkerke, whom the English still followed. But least Parma should play vpon aduantage, the Lord Admirall dispatched the Lord Henry Seymer, with his Squadron of small ships, vnto the coast of Flanders, to second those Hollanders which there kept watch vnder the conduct of Infant Nassau their Admirall: whose Nauy consisted of thirty five shippes, furnished with most skillfull Mariners and old experienced souldiers, whereof twelue hundred were Muskettiers, whom the States had culled out of the Garrisons. Their charge was, to stop all entrance into their Hauens, or entercoure with Dinkerke, whicher Duke Parma intended; though his men were vnwilling, hearing how their friends were welcome at the sea, onely the English fugitives, about feuen hundred, vnder the command of that treacherous Knight Sir William Stanley, were very forward to bee the first that should assault England.

(215) But the Armado, being now passed the place of their expected supply, and hauing gotten more Sea-roume for their huge bodied bulkes, *spread their maine sailes, and made away as fast as winde and water would giue them leaue, more fearing the small Flecte and forces of the English, (though nothing in number like vnto them) then standing vpon termes of honour, either of their chieftaines or Invincible Nauy. But surely, if they had knowne the want of powder that ours sustained, (a fault vnexculpable vpon our owne coasts,) they no doubt would haue stood longer to their tacklings; but God in this, as the rest, would haue vs to acknowledge, that we were onely deliuered by his owne gracious providence and Arme, and not by any policy or power of our owne.

(216) The Vincible Armado holding on their way, the English Admirall followed, least they should aslay to put into Scotland; but the winde comming faire, and feare of more encounters, with all their sailes spread they betooke themselves to flight, leauing Scotland on the West, and bending toward Norway; it aduised (but that necessity vrged, & God had infatuated their counsells) to put their shaken and battered bottomes into those blacke and dangerous Seas; neither was the Climate healthfull for the crazed bodies of the Spaniards, ouer-beaten and tyred with wants, being now entered the degree of Latitude. 57. from whence the Lord Admirall returned, leauing some Scouts to descry their successe.

(217) The Spaniards now cleared from those their haunting spirits, consulted most seriously what was to be done: the Popes credite was to bee respected, who had predicted this voyage to fortunate successe; the wrath of King Philip was to be feared, his great expenises thus lost; the aduenturers loofers if the voyage should bee left; the glory of the Spaniards laid in the fids, the Invincible Nauy in the ebbe of her fame: and England still England, not lorded by the spaniard, if they thus without further attempt should returne into Spaine. But withall, fife thousand of their souldiers were slaine; multitudes of sicke and maimed lay on their hands; twelue of their greatest shippes were funke, lost, and taken; their Cables, Maits and Sailes, cut, rent, and broken, with the English host, their ankers left, where the fired Hulkes forced them, their victuals failing, and fresh-water all spent, their enemies no lesse fierce and vndauntable, then fortunate: and their long expected friend, the Duke of Parma, though euer preparing, yet still forestalled by the Dutch, most firme Allies vnto the Queene: these circumstances wisely balanced, the voice went current for speeding into Spaine.

(218) But knowing that Scotland (whose Religious King was fast-knit in affection, and blood vnto Queene Elizabeth) would yield them no comfort, and hopelesse also that Norway would giue them any supply, they cast all their Mules and Horses ouer-board for sparing of their fresh-water: then framing their course to saile about Cathenes and the coasts of Ireland, so proceeded betwene the Orcades and Iles of Fero vnto the 61. degree Northward, whence the Duke of Medina, with his best stored shippes tooke Westward ouer the maine Ocean towards Biscay, and so arrived safely in Spaine, where for his Welcome, hee was depofed from all his authority, forbidden to come at the Court, and commanded to bee priuate. Neither could hee thus giue satisfaction for his bad successe, albeith imputed it to the treachery of his mariners, their ignorance, and small experience of those Northern Seas, the want of succours from the Prince of Parma, the tempests, shipwrackes, and illfortune, but not a word of the iudgements of God vpon this Gyantlike attempt to enlaue all England to the mountaines of Grenada, or to the mines of Pera.

(219) The residue of his shippes, about forty in number, fell neerer with the coast of Ireland, intending for Cape Clare, where they well hoped to water; but the windes contrary, and tempests storming vpon those dangerous Seas, many of their shippes perished vpon the shoares of Ireland, and among other a great Galliasse, wherein Michael de Oquendo was a commander, and two other of Venice, both shippes of great burthen, besides thirty eight more, together with most of the Spaniards contained within them. Those that got cleare of the danger, put forth to Sea, whereof some with a strong West winde were driuen into the channell of England, where part of them were taken by the English, others by men of Rochel in France, and some arrived at Newhauen in Normandy. In so much, that of one hundred thirty foure shippes, which had set saile out of Lisbon, onely fifty three returned to Spaine: of the foure Galliasse of Naples, but one: of the foure Gallies of Portugall, but one: and of the ninety one Gallions, and great Hulkes from diuers Prouinces, only thirty three returned, fifty eight being lost: in briefe, there were missing of their whole fleet fourescore and one vessels, and of the thirty thousand souldiers, thirteene thousand, fife hundred and odd. Of prisoners taken in England, Ireland and the Low-Countries were two thousand and more. In England, Don Pedro de Valdez, Don Vasquez de Sylua, and Don Alonso de Sayes and others were kept for their rancome: in Zeland, Don Diego de Pimentell, and in Ireland, Don Alonso de Lucan, Roderigo de Lasso and others of great account: to conclude, there was no famous or worthy family in all Spaine, which in this expedition lost not a sonne, a brother, or a kinsman.

(220) Thus were these Sea-seruices effected: as for the Land, preparations were made throughout the Kingdome, but the maine forces lying encamped at Tilbury vnder the command of the Earle of Leicester, thither her Maieity in person vpon the ninth of August repaired, full of Princely resolution, and more then feminine courage, whose loudly presence and imperiall speeches, as shee passed like some Amazonian Emperesse through all her Army, were so acceptable and gracious, that Her souldiers, full-fraught with manly spirit, yet receiued an access of hardinesse from so alacrious a patterne in their Mayden Queene: and both they perceived so well the loue of their Prince, and shee saw what it was to haue the loue of her subiects, that the harmony of both their affections was admirable, both of them professing resolution, and willing to sacrifice their liues in that most rightfull quarrel. But the God of Hosts hauing now prevented their forwardnesse, without losse of English blood, eie-soones the Campe was dissolved: and not long after Leicester ended his daies, hauing beene a Peere of great estate, but lyable to the common destiny of most Great ones, whom all men magnifie in their life time, but few speake well of after their death.

(221) The Land thus deliuered by the arme of the Omnipotent, and the Bore put back that sought to lay Englands faire vine-yard waste, Queene Elizabeth (who euer held ingratitude a Capitall sinne, but especially towards her Almighty proteour) commanded solemne Thankes-giuing to bee celebrated vnto the Lord God of Hosts, at the Cathedra Church of Saint Pauls in Her chiefe City of London, which which accordingly was done vpon Sunday the eight of September, where eleuen of the Spanisb Ensignes (the once badges of their brauery, but now of their vanity) were hung vpon the lower battlements of that Church, as palmes of praise for Englands deliuerance; a shew no doubt more acceptable to God, then when their spread colours did set out the pride of their shippes, threatening the blood of so many innocent and faithfull Christians.

(222) The next day, the Faire being kept in Southwarke, these faire flagges were spread vpon London-Bridge to the great ioy of the beholders, and eternall memory of Spanisb purposes, as irreligious as vnprosperous. But the solemne day assigned to be kept holy throughout the land, was the nineteenth of November being Tuesday, which accordingly was then done, and would to God had so continued still, being no lesse for our deliuerance, then was that Purim for the Iewes, which they instituted to be kept holy throughout their generations.

(223) Queene Elizabeth therefore, to bee her selfe an example vnto others, vpon the Sunday following, being the foure and twentieth of November, repayed from the Pallace of White-Hall in Westminster, through the streets of London in great Estate: and came accompanied with her Nobilitie vnto the Cathedra Church of Saint Paul, where discounting from her Chariot at the West-dore, shee humbled her selfe vpon her knees, and with great deuotion audibly praised God, acknowledging him her onely Defendor, who had thus deliuered the land from the rage of the enemy. And after the Sermon ended, wherein none other Argument was handled, but onely of prayse and glory to be rendered vnto God; her Maieity herselfe with most princely and Christian speeches exhorted all the people to their due performance of those religious seruices of thankfulness vnto God, like vnto another Ioshua, David, and Iosias. The Zelanders also to leaue a Memorill of their no lesse gratitude to God, then faithfulness to the Queene, caused a new Coyne of silver to bee stamped, hauing on the one side the Armes of their Country engrauen, with this Inscriptiō, Glory to God alone, and on the other side, the portraicts of great shippes, vnder-styled, The Spanisb Fleet, and in the circumference, It came, went, and was Anno 1588. Wherein they alluded to that quicke worke of Cesar, * Veni, vidi, vici, which wee haue seene also excellently described in deuise, where on the one side, the Spanisb Fleet had inscribed Veni, the Summe (the eye of the whole world) vidi, and the English Nauy, vici. In other coines also were stamped shippes fleeing, & sinking, and in the reuerse, Supplicants vpon their knees, with this Motto, Man propofeth, God disposeth. 1588. To the like effect also the Hollanders stamped the remembrance of this Armado in their monies, after the example of the Ancient, whose vie was to inscribe their victories vpon their Coines, of which kind were those with Spanisb Shippes, hauing this Word, Impius fugit nemine sequente.

(225) Neither did the Dutch alone participate the triumph of this glorious successe, but all other Nations also congratulated the same; which vniuersal-loy being excellently expresse in this ensuing Ode, by a * Stranger of eminent Piety and Learning, and translated into all the chiefe Languages of Christendome; we will here annex the same, as the Close and Epilogue of this Tragicō-Comedy, to bee perpetuated vnto all ensuing posterities.

(226) The thunderclappe of this Spanisb Armado thus past, and the Invincible vanquished, as the attempt & Issue was open to the eyes of the world, so the due consideration thereof was rooted in all true English hearts; whereupon the Nobles and Commonality being then assembled for Parliament, this court was at length thought fittest, that the proud Castilian should bee required vpon his owne coasts: And first it was determined to aide Don Antonio the expelled King of Portugall, whose title was apparently farre more iust then either Philip for England, or Stukely for Ireland, both which Kingdoms they had in hostile manner invaded: and this the rather was refolued on, for that the Spanisb king was endeavouring to repaire his dishonour by repairing his Fleet and Forces for a new expedition against England.

(227) This Don Antonio among other Competitors claimed the Crowne of Portugall after the decease of King Henry, as sprung from King Emanuel by his sonne Don Lewis the Infanz; but alledged by the Philipians to haue been his Bastard. Against which accusation Don Antonio had sentence for his legitimation by the Bishoppe of Angra, and euerly way fought to rubbe off that scandalous imputation. His conditions were such as well befitted a Crowne, he being a Prince of greater spirit then person, and yet of rare modesty and humility, seasoned with a disposition very deuout and religious, whereby hee came to bee in farre better fauour and esteeme then Philip of Spaine; for which cause hee was first made Defender of the Realme by the Gourcnours, and afterwards accepted King by the people, whereto he was in a manner enforced, seeing himselfe enuironed with many drawn swords in midst of a furious multitude.

(228) But Philip as mote ambitious, so more strong in men and munition, made warre into Portugall, and by his Generall, Duke Alba, put this new King vnto fights after which fortune, himselfe enters Portugall, where hee proclaimed eight hundred thousand Crowns to him that could bring him Don Antonio either alide or dead. But such was their loue vnto this vnfortunate Prince, that eight monethes hee kept in Portugall disguised, and had conference with conference with many, yet was neuer betrayed; but notable to hold vp his side, the Gouernours (as is the fashion of the world) daily falling to his stronger, after many confits, and much lamenting their miserable estate, left the Spaniard (who then gaped for nothing but Kingdomes) to possesse the Government of Portugall.

(229) Antonio's kingly stile thus ended, before it was thoroughly begunne, Philip had subiections offered him aide; and in such sort, as some that seemed Competitors, yielded him their rights, among whom Katherine Dutchesse of Braganza was one yea and Pope Gregorie himselfe, who had hitherto sided with Don Antonio, the Prior of Crato, knowing it was fittest to hold with the strongest, sent Philip his Apostolical allowance, the better to put on his New-gotten Crowne; exhorting him to thankfulness, for these his prosperities, and moving him earnestly to make warre against England, with proffers of assistance as we have said.

(230) Don Antonio thus driven out of his Kingdome, for succour repaired vnto the Court of France; where, of the Queene Mother, a pretended Competitor for the Portugall Crowne, he was both fauoured and aided at Seas for the Isles of Tereves: but such was his destiny in his Sea-fights also (the Peruagall being no lesse powerful then the Spanish Canons) that eight of the tallest French Ships were lost, & two thousand men slaine; among whom was the Lord Philip Trosy the Generall, whose death was so taken, and the expedition so censured, as the Portugall Captaine was reputed for Cowards, imprisoned in France, and many of them charged with corruption and treason; so that all his hopes were now in the wane, and no further assistance could bee expected of the French.

(231) The pore Prince thus dejected in France, knowing the vniuersall report of Queene Elizabeth great fame, obtained leave of her Maiesty for access vnto her sacred presence, whose Court had euer been a famous Sanctuary to all oppressed Princes, or distressed Estates: where shewing his right to the Portugall Crowne, and clearing the objections touching his basardie (which imputation in sundry languages hee refused in Print to the publike view of the world) receiued now comfort to bee set in his Kingdome, England hauing so iust an occasion to Kingdome Spainie. Among whom once more he assayed to trie the fauour of Fortune; his Petition to the Queene being onely this, that she would but land him safe in his Country, and amongst his own People, of whose assured loue and readinesse to receiue him as their King, and thence forward to defend him and his iust Title, hee nothing doubted. So honest and reasonable a suite could not but finde fauour with so gracious a Queene: whereupon provision being made for the Portugall voyage, he embarked at Plimouth in Aprill, whence fixe of the Queene shippes, and twenty more of warre (besides many other ordained for transportation) spread their Sailes vnder the conduct of the euer-faithfull Sir Francis Drake, and the most valorous Sir Iohn Norris Generall for the land seruice, with eleuen thousand soldiers, and twenty five hundred Mariners. These landing in a Bay of Galicia, nere vnto the Groine, in their March were met and encountered within halfe a mile of the Towne, but their enemies were soone forced to retire vnto their Gates.

(232) The next day General Norris hauing viewed the aduantage, resolved to attempt the place by a scallado, and to land some Artillery, to beate the ships and Gallies which did play vpon their troopes, which was effectually performed; and the Gallies forced to abandon the Roade, the Basse-Town was surprized, and in three severall places entered, where the Inhabitants with a great cry tooke into the high Towne, but some prevented, elapsing the fury of the sword fledde to the Rockes, where they were found and slaine to the number of five hundred. Among these for hid, Don Iuan de Luna, a man of great command, was one, who the next morning came forth, and yielded himselfe to the Generals deuotion; Iuan de Vera, a Commissary of victuals, was likewise taken, who confessed that there was in the Towne three hundred thousand Ducats of silver, and order giuen for the baking of three hundred thousand of Bisket, that the Towne was stored with two thousand Pipes of wine, a thousand lasses of Oyle, three thousand Kintals of Beefe, a great quantitie of Beanes, Pease, Wheat and Fish, and of Match and Harqueboizes three Barks were brought thitherence long before. All which (hee confessed) were for a new voyage against England. And indeed such store of wines was there found, as the English Souldiers vnto little moderation in drinking, did not onely lay themselves open to danger from the vpper Towne, but by distemperature so inflamed and infected their bloud, that it caused a greace mortality and infection in the whole Army.

(233) The Basse-Town thus gotten, a sudden rescue of two thousand men so resolutely came to the very Gates, as though no contrary power could possibly keepe them from entrance, but in the first brunt of resistance, they were content to make their heeles the safe-guardians of their heades, of whom yet many were cut short by the English pursuers. With the like feare the shippes in the Roade were fraught, whose Souldiers overcharging the great Ordinance of a great Gallion, abandoned herbord, and set her on fire, which for the space of two daies burned in most terrible wise, so that of fifty great peeces but sixe were found whole, the rest broken and melted, and so brought away by the English; but the higher towne strong both by situation and sufficiency for resistance, resolutely held out, onely intremed by Parley to haue faire Warres. And being built for the most part on a hard rocke, one place was found mineable, where the Generall the fourth day of this siege set men on worke, who bedded their powder somewhat too short of the wal, whereby that designe took not the supposed effect. But this error reduced, another great was committed, for the Mines againe set on worke, came right vnder the Wall, but somewhat wide of a great Tower thereupon built, so that when the blast of powder brake forth, it ouerthrew but a part of the same, and left the other standing tottering and shaken, which being not regarded in the heat of assault, fell suddenly vpon the English, and slew Capitaine Sydenham with thirty Souldiers besides, to the great astonishment of the rest there employed, not knowing the cause whereof it came, but rather suspecting it a Stratagem of the Towne; and the rest of the rubbish lay to looke vnder foot, that the Assaulters could haue no sure standing to make their fight.

(234) Whiles these things were in doing, the Generall had certaine notice that the Comde de Andrada had assembled an Army of eight thousand strong, which was but the beginning of another more strong, leuiued vnder the Comde de Alencara; the former, not passing fixe miles off, and both of them intending the rescue of the Groine: To prevent which, Sir Iohn Norris with nine Regiments met them, and presently fell to a hotte skirmish, whose brunt the enemy notable to endure,ooke ouer a Bridge, built vpon a Creeke of the Sea, at the further foot whereof their Campe lay very strongly entrenched. Sir Edward Norris, Colonell Sydenham, the Captaine Hinder, Fulford, and Barton entered the Bridge, whose further end was barricaded with Barrels, where comming to push of pike and sword, Sir Edward was grievously hurt in the head, Capitaine Hinder receiued five wounds in the heade and face by the sword; Capitaine Fulford hurt in the left arme with a shot, and Capitaine Barton hurt in the eye. Notwithstanding, the Generall so seconded the encounter as the Guard was ouerthrowne, and the whole Army put into route, of whom our men had the Chafe fully three miles in foure sundry wayes. What the slaughter was, is vncertaine, but supposed to bee great; besides others that were found hid in Vineyards and hedges, and two hundred put to sword that had taken into a Cloister. In this seruice the Kings Standard was taken, some plate and rich apparell found in their Campe, and the Country for three Miles compass set on flaming fire; the Generall making his retreat with the Kings Colours and Armes displayed before him, to the great honour of the English.

(235) Thus returning vnto the Groine, and wanting Cannons to batter the walles, the English fired the Basse-Towne, embarked from thence, and put againe to Sea. But the windes being contrary, many assaults were made before the Fleet could recover the Burlings, in which passage Robert Earle of Essex with M. Walter Damer his brother, accompanied with others, came to the Fleet, which Earle hauing put himselfe into the iourney against the opinion of the world, or well-liking of the Queene, seemed vnto the Sager fort to hazard his fortunes; but other more stirring spirits, held it the great aduancement of his reputation; whereof I thinke I may say, as Tacitus said of Vespasian employment in Britaine, That there was laid the first foundation of his future esteeme.

(236) The Fleete thus encreased, they landed in Portugall, euen vnder shot of the Castle of Peniche, where the Sea growing high, many were in perill of drownings; for most of them waded to the waile for the Shoare. Of this Towne and Pece, Comde de Fuenles had the command; who with five Companies of Spaniards failed out against the English, and made their approach close to the Sea-side; whereupon the Earle of Essex with Sir Roger Williams diuided their men into two Troupes, the one keeping the Sands along the Shoare, and the other ouer the sand-hilles made towards the in-land. Which the enemy seeing, halted to the encounter, and came vnto fight, euen within push of Pike; but were so entertained, as they had no great liking, but presently turned their backs, and fled further then the English had reason to follow. The Towne they left vndefended, so that it was entered without any resistance, and the Castle summoned the same night, the Capitaine whereof was Antonio de Arida, a Portugall, who demanding, and being satisfied, that Don Antonio was present, gaue vp the peece, with the munition therein. Vnto this place some Fryers & other poore of the Country, came to welcome their King, promising him (in the name of the rest) a sufficient supply both of horse and foot, which notwithstanding was neuer performed.

(237) Here it was thought fittest that the wounded and sicke should remaine, with sufficient provision, and seuen companies of foot to guard the ships and Castle, and the maine Army to march ouer land vnto Lisbon, the Metropolitane of Portugall, accounted the strongest Fort in the World, and whoe soeuer held that, might (in their esteeme) make head against the mightiest Monarch in the Earth; whither likewise Sir Francis Drake (Generall of the Sea-seruice) promised to come, if the iniury of weather did not hinder him. The March vnderaken, Tarres Redras made some shew of resistance, but presently vpon the approach of the English, that Castell was abandoned, and left to the possession of Don Antonio, whose hopes hereupon beganne to enlarge, thinking the whole would stand for his claime; but therein was not a little decieued; for victuals growing scarce in the Army, the Country did not supply them according to expectation, neither came in any of strength. Notwithstanding the English Army from Redras marched to San Sebastian, thence to Lares, and lodged the fifth day at Aluelana, three miles from Lisbon, where many of their Souldiers perished by drinking in two places of poisoned standing waters, as also in eating of honey, purposely left in the houses, and spiced with poison, as it was thought.

(238) The five and twentieth of May, the English Army came vnto Lisbon, whose Suburbs were found abandoned, houses of provision for corne & victuals fired, and none left to defend but a sort of olde folkes and beggars, crying in the streets, Viva el Rey Don Antonio; and about midnight they within the Towne set fire on their houses that stood within vpon the wall. The English wearied with the six daies march, want of victual, the last nights watch, and many of them weake, were desirous of rest;

whereof the enemy hauing aduertisement, in the dead of the night sallied out of the Towne, and made their assault in three severall streets, but chiefly vpon Colonell Brets Quarters, who being at rest (as most of the Army were) with what halt was possible, put himselfe, and his in Armes, & so thoroughly made head, that hee was slaine in the place, Capitaine Carr with the like resistance and valour ended his life; Capitaine Cassidy wounded to death; Capitaine Cane hurt, but not mortally. The others found not their attempts so easie, but were put to a suddaine and foule retreat; in such sort that the Earle of Essex (full of high spirit, and hore youthly bloud) had them in chafe to the very gates of the high town; and (as it was truly reported) the enemies losse did triple the English, as well in quantity, as in men of quality.

(239) Mean while General Drake with his whole Fleete was come to Cascais, and possessed the towne without any resistance, for the inhabitants at the discourtesy of his Nauie, fledde with bagge and baggage into the mountains, which the Generall perceiuing, sent vnto them a Portugall Pilote, to offer them all peaceable kindnesse, so as they would accept of their rightfull King, and minister necessities to the Army which hee had brought. Which offer they joyfully embraced, and presently sent two chiefe men of the Towne, to signify their loyalty to Don Antonio, and their honest affection to his Army, whereupon Sir Francis immediately landed his Companies, but not without perill of the Castell, which being guarded by the Spaniards, held out against him for their King.

(240) At Lisbon the Portugals had promised to aid Antonio with three thousand horse, besides other supplies from the Duke of Bragansa, Don Francisco de Toledo, and others, at a day prefixed, and now altogether past, by reason (as it seemeth) that the Spaniards hauing chiefe command in all places, they were vnable by any means to make head. Whereupon the vnfortunate Antonio seeing the time expired, & but forty horse come, nor of foot sufficient to furnish two Ensignes, grew almost hopelesse, yet assailed hee to perseuade a stay before Lisbon for 9. daies more: but the Towne being strong, and the English declining (for there was the first apparant shew of sicknesse among them) the Portugals backward, and of base resolutions, ready to obey any of themselves may be rich; and the Generall hauing already done more then was promised, left they should hazard the honour which hitherto had bene gotte, denied his request, and gaue present order to return to Cascais; himselfe, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the stand, that was made in the high street, till the whole Army was drawn into the field: at which time, the King (euen herein of kindly disposition towards his Naturae) made request to saue the Suburbs from spoile, which if the English had ransacked, they had bene the richest Arme that euer returned to England. But now ready to depart Lisbon, the noble Essex in the courage of his Martiall bloud, ranne his speare and brake it against the Gates of that City: demanding alowde, if any Spaniard mewed therein, druff aduerture forth in fauour of his Mistresse to break a staffe with him. But those Gallants thought it safer to court their Ladies with amorous discourses, then to haue their loues written on their breasts with the point of his English Speare.

(241) Being now come to Cascais, intelligence was brought by a Fryer, that the enemy was marched vnto Saint Iulian with a strong power to encounter the English, vnto whose Generall, the Generall Norris sent a Trumpet, promising to meete him the next morning if hee durst abide his comming, and withall gaue him the lie: the Earle of Essex also sent him a particular Carrell, offering himselfe against any of theirs, if they had any of his qualitie, or else fixe, eight or tenne, to trie single combat, where at this Spaniards combe was so cut, as in the night, before battell, in great feare and perturbation bee dislodged, and returned to Lisbon, not answering the Challenge, but threatening to hang the Messenger, who followed him euen to the very Gate. Then was the Castle of Cafala rendered vpon condition, that the men of Armes should depart with bag and baggage; which Pecece in part, by the Order of the Generall, was blowne vp by mine. During which time threefore Hulkes laden with Corne, Mafts, Cables, Copper, and Waxe, beeing the Spaniards Kings prouision were taken going to Lisbon.

(242) The English hauing thus farre proceeded, put againe to Sea, when vnlooked for, and in a great calme, nine Gallies fell in the winde of their Fleet, and so plaied vpon a stragling Barke of Plimouth, that Captaine Caluerly, his Lieutenant, the Master, and some of the Mariners, abandoning the vessell, betooke them to their Boates, whereof one, (in which the Captaine and Master were) was ouerrunne by the Gallies, and they both drowned. Two other Hulkes also stragling from the Fleet, were set vpon by the Spaniards, in one of which, Captaine Minslow fought to the last, and very valiantly after his ship was on fire; but whether fired by himselfe or the enemy, could not be iudged; the calme being so still, as no succour could bee sent from the fleet, to their great griefe.

(243) Thus continuing seuentene daies on board, many of the dead Souldiers were cast into the Sea; and the whole now consisted of two thousand men, who coming to Pigo, found every streete fenced with a strong Barricade, and but only one man in the Towne, the Inhabitants making toward Bayon as fast as they could drive; then was both the Town and all the Country for seuen miles compass set on a flame. Which seruice thus performed, Sir Francis Drake with the Queenes ships safely arrived at Plimouth, and vpon the second of Iuly following arrived Sir John Noris, hauing both of them performed the parts of worthy Generals.

(244) Whilst these Realmes were at variance each against others, the French were not quiet among themselves, the King somewhat voluptuous, but excessively prodigall towards his favorites; the Nobility ambitious, mistrustfull, and disloyall; the Clergy turbulent, and vndutiful, bending all their force and thoughts against the plantation of the truth. To vniue friendship therefore some league had bene made, for confirmation whereof the three Estates were assembled at Boys. For the Clergy appeared one hundred thirty foure deputies, among whom were foure Arch-bishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generals of Orders; for the Nobility came one hundred and foure score gentlemen; and for the third Estate an hundred foure score and eleuen Deputies, all of them Lawyers and Merchants. Vpon the first sitting, and before these best wits of France, King Henry made a Solemne Oration to perswade vnion, full of liuely affection, true magnanimity, and pregnant reasons, deliuered with such an admirable eloquence and grace, as it rauished the eares of all present, besides the opening of the propositions; the which, Mantelon, the keeper of the Seale, for him further prosecuted; after him Reynauld de Beaulme, Archbishop of Bourges, Patriarke and primate of Aquaine, spake in the same argument; and lastly, Nichell Marteau, Prouost and President for the third Estate, confirmed, and consented to all that had bene said. Whereupon an oath of vnion was taken, to binde the King, them, and all their posterities, the fundamental Lawes and liberties of France onely referred.

(245) This notwithstanding, the Leaguers, to hit the marke whereat they aimed, daily diuulged and buzzed the French Kings digresses, and also instill the Guize in his Throne; the Papists wrongs were greuously expostulated, their Churches burnt, and Altars profaned; the people oppressed with impositions and subsidies, places of Iudgement set to sale, and spiritual benefices to him that would giue most; the offices at Court, they alleged, were managed by men of meane ranke; the Noblemens seruices neglected and vnrewarded. All these, and more, were complained of, and all to make the King base in the peoples eye, the Guize himselfe the while temporizing with both, as diswading the King to subiect his authority vnto their complaints, and at the same present perswading the other, to bee vehement in their pursuits.

(246) Among their other practise one was against the King of Nauarre, whom the Clergy condemned for an Heretike, the chiefe (as they termed him) of the relapse, excommunicated and deprived him of the Government of Guienne, and of all other dignities, as beeing unworthy of successions of Crownes or Realmes. But Henry, with Felsus thought it vnreasonable, to condemn this Prince without hearing, and therefore desired to haue him againe summoned, and againe to bee sworne to the vnion.

(247) To this motion was answered, that the Cardinal of Bourbon his vnkle had once obtained absolution for him; that the Queene mother had many times assayed to winne him; many learned doctors had been sent to reclaim him; but all in vaine. For, from the Cradle (said they) hee hath bene brought vp in this new Heresie, hath bene condemned by the Councell of Trent, receiued againe into grace by the Consistory, is againe fallen into the error which hee abiured, and is now an Heretike, relapsed, vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of respect, and vnworthy to bee praised for: for the holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schismaticke, excommunicated him as incapable of succession, and therefore must the Estates of France ratifie the Popes sentence; and King Henry must thereunto subscribe; if not, the Duke of Guize, who was Master of the Castle, and carried the keyes at his owne girdle, would dissolue the assembly and lay all the blame vpon his Maistie.

(248) Thus then (by the purpose of man) the first Prince of the blood, and the onely remainder, after so many filters and couens of Amou, Alencon, Eurenx, Berry, Bourgoyne, Angolisme and Orleans; and which only succeeded that of Valois, was now deprived of the succession which Nature gaue him, without calling, or hearing of his iustifications.

(249) To further this Guizian enterprize, his followers buzz into the heads of the multitude, that it was the Kings Climatricall yeere, and so many presumptions were observed, as it was told the King in plaine termes that the Duke of Guize would surprize him. Whereupon, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of reuenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition, at last, by the lightning, supposing a thunder-clap would follow, he sought timely to prevent the danger, by taking away his life, that intended the blow. Which was not so secretly carried, but that the designe was discovered, and a scrowle laid vnder Guize his Napkin as he sat at dinner, wherein it was written, that his life was in danger; but hee, as one confident in his owne power, wrote in the same scrowle, these words, they dare not; and threw it from him vnder the Table. Other aduertisements hee had if wee may beleue the additions of Serres from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine, and Sauoy, that a bloody Catastrophe should dissolue this assembly, their Almanakes had observed it, and it was generally predicted for Saint Thomas day.

(250) But the Duke bearing himselfe bolde vpon his owne greatness, neglected all motives, and very presumptuously spake to the King, complaining that the affaires of France inclined from bad vnto worse, vncurable, and almost growne desperate, wherefore, the charge hee had receiued, hee would againe giue vp, and retired in the Country, least least other mens sinnes should be reputed his.

(251) The King, who had resolved on his death, gaue him good words, with promise of amendment what in him lay, and held him with familiar discourses, and fauourable countenance, vntill a fite time should bee offered; which was the three and twentieth of December, when the Lords sitting in Councell, and entering consultation, the Guize was called for vnto the King, who as hee lifted vp the Tapestry into his Cabiner, was charged vpon by the Guard, and with their swords and partisans presently slaine, the King aouching, that thenceforth he would rule alone. And not long after the Cardinal of Guize, the Duke dranke of the same cup at the commandment of the King.

(252) This death of the Guize & Cardinal, caused the King to bee exceedingly hated of the Papals, whose Preachers banded his reproches in their Pulpits, incensing the people to open rebellion, and as Furies of hell heaped an liade of curses vpon the heads of the Executioners. In Paris the Kings furniture, and in the Louvre his pictures were broken, his Armes beaten down, his Images dragged through the streets, his great Seale defaced, and his royall name blurred with many opprobrious tearmes. Yea and the Colledge of Sorbon as forward as any, concluded by a publike Act, That the people of France were free from the Oath of Obedience and Fealty which they stood engaged in vnto Henry of Valois, that lawfully, and with a good conscience they might arme themselves against him, seeing his reuenges, and employ it in their warres for his ouerthrow.

(253) Contrariwise the Duke of Guize was extolled to heauen, Orations made of his commendable exploits in Hungary against the Turkes, at Larzac against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour, at Vimory, and at other places; in a word, such were the intestine troubles of France, as the king sent for Henry King of Navarre to helpe quench the flames of ciuill sedition, which were mounted so high, as that the Leaguers preuailed against the Lords of Parliament, profaned Churches, violated Virgines, and defied their Christian profession with streames of blood. And to fill vp the measure of their impious iniquity, a Jacobin Friar, by name James Clement, when the King had besieged Paris (the head City of this rebellion) made vowes to kill the Tyrant (as hee termed him) to free that holy City from *Senacherib*s siege; with which resolution hee went to Doctor Bourgoine Priour of his Couent, and imparted this damnable proiect to him, to Father Commiolet, to other Iesuites, and to the heades of the League, all of them encouraging him to this Diuclish designe, with promise of Abbeys and Bishopricks if hee escaped, and if he died in the action to be made a Martyr, and haue place in heauen about the Apostles.

(254) Thus furnished with blessings for this cursed act, vpon the first of August the Monke went to Paris, and had priuate access to the King to deliuer a letter, pretending some matter of importance; but as the King read it, the Diabolically Instrument with a knife from his sleue, wounded him in the bottome of his belly, and there left the knife, which the King drew forth, and with the same struck this Jacobine about the eye: their strugling being heard, many hastily came in, who seeing the King wounded, and all in gore blood, in their rage stabbed the Monster to death, and not many dayes after, K. Henry died of the wound.

(255) Whereupon Charles Cardinal of Bourbon a younger brother to Anthony King of Navarre, and vnkle vnto Henry then the present King, was proclaimed Lieutenant Governor, yea and gold and silver coined with his picture and stile of Charles the tenth King of France. Howbeit Henry King of Navarre was proclaimed of the Army, whose right was before that Papall Prelates, and whom the last Henry by his last will ordained to bee his Successor, Not with standing onely in respect of his Religion, being a professed Protestant, the Leaguers made such head against him that hee was enforced to sue vnto that Generall Sanctuary of Princes, Queen Elizabeth for her aide, who euer fauouring the progresse of the Gospell, and knowing Nauarres claime to be above all other (of that Nation) for the French Crown, and that the Spaniard was setting foot into France: first, sent him twenty thousand pound sterling, with powder, munition for warre, and certain ships also to serue at his command; and causing a generall muster to be taken in most of the Shires in England, sent foure thousand souldiers furnished, from euery of them into France, to which seruice the Citizens of London set forth a thousand very well appointed and seruicable men: the Generall of all which forces, was the noble Peregrine Barton Lord Willoughby; whose want hee again supplied with three thousand foot, which were sent into Brittain, vnder the conduct of Sir John Norris; that Ioune of Alais: theselyoung with the Prince Damber Lord Generall of that Prouince, performed many worthy exploits for the French King.

(256) But Parma being entered France, and the Pope with his Cardinals fulminating his Excommunication against Henry and his adherents: Queen Elizabeth (who neuer was daunted with such flashes) sent into France Robert Earle of Essex, for her Lieutenant Generall ouer foure thousand footmen, and two hundred horse, (besides many Pioners) all of them to bandy for the King against his enemies the Leaguers. The Earle, though young, yet full of valour, was followed with many voluntarie Gentlemen, whose countenances well shewed the courage of their hearts: These landing in Normandy, laide siege vnto the strong Rois, in assault whereof his brother Walter Deuereux was slaine with a small shot, to the excessive griefe of the Earle, and others, being a Gentleman trained vp, both by Academicall and Marshall education, vnto very great hopes and expectation.

(257) But King Henry finding many rubs in his way, the Leaguers still increasing their strengthes from Rome and Spaine, and the Crowne of France laid at stake for him, that threw most, thought it good policy (though proued to him in the end disastrous and fatal) to temporize with the predominating faction; and therefore leauing the Religion wherein hee had bene bred, fell to that of Rome which euer till then hee had resisted, and after great suit made to the Pope, was lastly absolved by the Holy Father, who heaped whole streames of blessings vpon his sacred head, himselfe swearing to defend the Romish faith against all impugners: so that now all sides satisfied, without contradictions, Henry of Navarre was crowned King of France. Onely the Spaniards were vnwilling to leaue that faire Country fortified in Brittain vpon the River, ouer against Brest; whence after much slaughter, General Norris forced them, though with the losse of some English, & life of Captain Furbisher commander of the Fleet.

(258) The Leaguers not liking Nauarres advancement, mistrusting that his conseruation was fained, and temporary, as being but a steppe, the easier to mount the royall throne: by treason laide wait for his life, and crost what they could his countenance at Rome; whilst the Spaniards employed all their wits for the worrying of France, and so farre perfited in their designs, as King Henry by proclamation denounced warre against Spaine, and Philip in like manner proclaimed warre against France; in which state they stood, during the life of Ernesus Archduke of Austria, brother in law and Nephew vnto King Philip, whose Gouvernour hee then was in the Low-Countries.

(259) After whom succeeded his brother Albertus the Military Cardinal, and Arch-duke of Austria, who no sooner was made Gouvernour in place of his Brother, but that hee prepared against the French and United Estates; and to make his allies, hee first beganne with Callis, a thing long before projected by others in his place; that Towne being a Sea-port of great importance, as the English found it whilst it was theirs, and the losse thereof great, as Queene Mary and her wife Statists both took it, and felt it.

Queen Elizabeth offered aid to recover Callis.

(260) At this time the Garrison was small, and the Governour negligent, vndirect, and vnfornate, though having notice from Netherland that the Spaniards meant her siege; so that richbanke left vnmanned, and in great ruine, was entred vpon by the Cardinal, and such as resisted driuen into the Towne; where, with the Inhabitants hee grew to a composition for the surrender, Vjldoffen the Governour neuer interposing therein.

(261) Callis thus turning Spanish, and the Spaniards still intending for England, Elizabeth solicited the French king, & proffered her aid for recovery of that Peerce; but hee empowerrised by warre, fought to regaine his losses rather by some faire conditions of peace, then to depend vpon the dependencies & hazard of Armies; at which resolution our Noble Senobia was nothing well pleased, and therefore to preuent the practices of Spain, began to make good against them, and prepared another expedition to Sea. But dealing more prince-like then Philip had done by her (who made fairest pretence of peace, when hee was hott in preparing warre) hee caused to be published and printed a Declaration of the iust causes moving her to set forth her Navy for the defence of her Realme, the Tenor wherof we thinke not vnfit to be here inserted.

The Declaration touching the setting forth of a Navy.

(262) To all Christian people to whom this Declaration shall come to be read or heard, greeting; Wee Robert Earle of Essex, and Ewe, Viscount Hereford, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Bourchier, and Louaine, &c. and Charles Lord Howard, Baron of Effingham, Lord High Admirall of England, &c. haueing the charge of a Royall Naue of Shippes, prepared and sent to the Seas, by the most Excellent Princeesse the Lady Elizabeth, Queene of England, France and Ireland, &c. doe giue all men knowledge that the said Naue under our charge is by her Maiesty prepared, and sent to the Seas, for defence of her Maiesties Realmes, Dominions, and Subiects, against such mighty Forces as wee are aduertised from all partes of Christendome, to be already prepared by the King of Spain, and by further prouisions of men and shippes daily sent for, are to be mightily increased, to inuade her Maiesties Realmes, as heretofore in the yeere of our Lord, 1588. was attempted (euen when there was a Treaty continued by both their Commissioners for a Peace) with a greater Army then euer before in his time was set to Seas: though by Gods goodnes and the valiance and wisdom of her Noble and faithfull Subiects, the same was notably made frustrate. And because her Maiesty hath good intelligence of perfect amity with all Kings and Princes of Christendome, sauing with the King of Spain, who hath this many yeeres most vnwisly professed openly great enmity by diuers actions, both against her royall person and her people, and countries, without any iust cause first giuen on her Maiesties part: Therefore wee the said Earle, and Lord Admirall doe ascertain all persons, that wee are most faithfully commanded by her excellent Maiesty, to forbear from offending in this our voyage of any manner of persons of what Nation soeuer, except the said Kings Naturall Subiects, or such other borne Strangers, as shall giue to the said King manifest aide with men, shippes, artillery, victuall, and other warlike prouisions for inuasion of her Maiesty. Which her Maiesties commandment we meane dutifully to obserue, and do therefore giue strait charge to all persons, that shall serue in this Navy underneath vs, vpon pain of extreme punishment to obserue the same yet to auoid all occasions that may breed question, who they are, being not the King of Spaines Subiects, that shall be charged by vs, to be manifest aiders for the furnishing and strengthening of the said Kings Forces, provided either by land or sea, to attempt any inuasion of her Maiesties countries: Wee doe for the liquidation of this doubt, earnestly in Gods name require and charge all persons, that are not the said Kings naturall Subiects, and yet that haue giuen him aide with their shippes, victuall, and munition as is above said, to withdraw all their said shippes prepared for the warre, and all their prouisions of hostilitie out of any Hauens of Spain or Portugall, or from the company and seruice of the Kings shippes against our Navy; and sheweth vs to returne either to their owne Countries, or if they shall like to come to our Naue, to whom, in the reuerend name of our Soueraign Lady the Queene Maiesty, wee doe promise all security, both for their persons and goods, to be used and defended as friends, and to suffer all their Shippes and prouisions, that were taken by the King of Spain, or intended for his seruice, or that shall be by the Owner withdrawn from his aide, to remaine in their free dispositions, so as the same be used in all sorts as friends, and not as enemies to the Queene Maiesty, and to vs her Generals: and if any shall vpon knowledge of this her Maiesties most honourable Order, and of our promise (to obserue the same as fauourably as we may) willingly and manifestly refuse to accept this our offer, and shall not endeuor themselves to performe this reasonable request, tending to their good and liberty; wee shall then bee iustly moued, as by the law of Armes we may, to take and use all such so refusing this our offer, as manifest aiders of the King of Spain with forces to inuade her Maiesties Dominions, and so manifest enemies: and in such case of that refusal, if any harme shall happen by any attempts against their Persons, Shippes and goods, by any our Naue, for the aiding of the said King: there shall bee no iust cause for them hereafter to complaine, or to procure their Naturall Princes and Lords to sollicite restitution or amends for the same. And for the more notification hereof, wee haue thought good to haue the Originall hereof to be signed with our hands, and with our Seales, to be sent by any that will require to read or see the same: And likewise wee haue put the same in Print, in French, Italian, Dutch and Spanish, and haue also caused the same to be distributed into as many Ports of Spain and Portugall as conveniently might be for the better knowledge to be had in the said Ports, as also in all other Ports under his subiection.

(263) These things premised, leuenteene of her Maiesties Ships Royall, three of the Lord Admirals, foure and twenty of the States shippes, Marchants, Men of Warre, and Victuals about one hundred, in all to the number of one hundred and fifty Saile, in the beginning of May met at Plimouth, where such lawes were ordained for the true seruice of God, and Iustice in the Army, as it seemed rather a Regiment of Ciuill Academians, then a Rendevou of Souldiers: and her Maiesty likewise in the Court, as Hezekiah in the Temple, opened her heart vnto the Lord in this wise.

Most omnipotent Maker, and Guider of the Worlds Masse, that onely searchest and saddest the bottome of our hearts conceits, and in them feele the true Originals of all our actions intended: thou that by thy foresight doest truly discern, how no malice of reuenge, nor quittance of iniurie, nor desire of blood-shed, nor greedinesse of lucre, hath bred the resolution of our now set out Army, but a heedfull care and wary watch, that no neglect of office, nor ouer-surety of haueu might breed either danger to vs, or glory to them: these being the grounds wherewith thou doest inspire the mind; wee humbly beseech thee with bended knees, prosper the worke, and with best forewinds guide the iourney, speed the victory, and make the returne the aduancement of thy glory, the triumph of thy fame, and safety to the Realme, with the least losse of the English blood. To these devout petitions Lord giue thou thy blessed Grant.

and Ewe in the Du-Repulse; both of them iointlie her Maiesties Lieutenants Generall for this seruice, by Sea and by land. The Vice-Admirall was the Lord Thomas Howard, shipped in the Miramar, and the Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, in the Warre-Spite; and for the Statie was Admirall, Ion Van Duuenoord, who serued in the Neptune, a Shippe of foure hundred Tunnes, and accordingly the whole Fleet was diuided into five squadrons, with a commandement that euery Squadron should attend his Admirall, & euery one of these had his Vice-Admirall assigned. Of the first was Sir Robert Southwell in the Lion; of the second, Sir Francis Vere, in the Rainbow; the third Sir Robert Dudley attending the Lord Thomas Howard, in the Ren-Pareille; the fourth, Robert Crosse following Sir Walter Rawleigh in the Swift-Sure; and the last was, Ion Gerbrantson, Vice-Admirall of the Hollanders.

(265) For the Land-seruice besides the Generalls, were Sir Francis Vere, Lord Marshall: Sir John Wingfield Campe-master Generall: Sir Coniers Clifford, Sergeant Maior, Sir George Carew, Master of the Ordnance: John Bucke Prouost Marshall: Oliver Lambert, Quarter-Master, and Roger Asley, Secretary. The Colonels of the Army were the Earle of Suffex, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir Richard Winkfield, and Sir Edward Winkfield of the Voluntaries, and for the Dutch, was the Count Lodowicke, in all about ten thousand men. The private Council for this expedition being selected, certain instructions were sent sealed to euery shippe, with a commandement to the Captain, not to break them open, till such time as they came to the South-Cape, vntill they happened to be secured from the Fleete by storme or mischance, but if taken by an enemy, then to call them ouer-board.

(266) Thus ready for Seas, vpon the first of Iune a warning Peerce being shot off, all weyed Anchors, and with a gallant shew, and full sailes followed the Lord Admirall; but the wind scanting before they past Cornwall, they were enforced backe into the Sound, where staying two dayes, vpon the thirde the winde came about, and with a prosperous Gale brought them to Cape Saint Vincent, where an Irish Barke was mette with from Cadiz, which signified the strength of the Towne, and the shipping that lay in the Bay, to witte, twenty Gallies, ninety Saites of Shippes, wherof five were of those great Gallions, which are called the Kings twelue Apostles, (all double the sonnes of Thunder) two great Galliaes, three Frigates, three Argosies, twenty Biskaines; the rest were Merchants shippes, rich, and of great burden, whose ladings were munition, coine, oyle, wine, waxe, silke, cloth of gold, and quicke-siluer; some bound for the Indians, some for Britaine, some for Lisbone, and some for other places. Newes most acceptable vnto the Generalls, who having thitherwards, vpon Sunday the twentieth of Iune, assailed at the Frery of Saint Sebastian, on the west side of Cadiz, to land their men, but the place strong, and the Seas going high, their purpose was hindered.

(267) May I relate with hope of credite what others haue reported vpon their owne eye-sight? At the first approach of this Royall Navy before Cadiz, a faire Doue (a fortunate Presager) betimes in the morning, is said to haue lighted vpon the Mayneyard of the Lord Admirals ship, and there to haue late quietly the space of three howres, euery man gazing, but no man suffered to harme her: as also the last day of their departure thence, another Doue presented her self in the same Order, and in the same shippe, growing wonderfully tame and familiar with the men, and so continued with them till they came into England.

(268) The day following their approach, being the first of the weeke, the Spanish ships in the road, in number fifty nine, attended with twenty Gallies, by the aduise of their Admirall, shot with the tide within the point of Maine-land, vnto Castle Puntall; and in the straites of the Baye, forced themselves in good order, and of a reasonable distance, as well to offend the enemy, as to relieue each others interchangeably.

(269) The Bay was narrow whereunto they had entred, full of Rocks, shelves, & sands, al which notwithstanding, it was in Council determined, that the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Robert Southwell, with some Londoners, and a Squadron of the Low-Country shippes, should beginne the fight; which was most valiantly attempted, maintained, & continued, the thundering shot battering their bulks, and renting their shrowdes.

(270) In the heate whereof, the Earle of Essex, (in Council appointed to keepe the Maine battell) vpon the fodaine from Port Saint Marier side, thrust himselfe forme into this Sea-fight, which the other Generalls perceiving, and the Arke-Royall too vnweldy for that narrow water, took into his Pinnefle, and forwarded the fight to the end: Meane while the Gallies were assailed by Sir John Winkfield, who with his small shippes so handled their sides, as they were forced to creepe by the Shore, and so got passage at the Bridge, contrary to the expectation of the English, whose eyes were euer aiming at the fairest Marke, which indeed was the Philip, so battered with Bullets that hee beganne to stagger, and giue ouer fight; whose souldiers seeking to saue themselves by water, and swimming, let this Apostle (their Admirall) on fire, by whole example, the Saint Thomas, another of Spaines Apostles did the like, least the English should leade them in triumph of their victory. The rest of the Spanish Fleet ranne themselves on ground in the Bay of Port Real, to gaine some breathing time from their still following pursuers.

(271) These seruices thus forwarded, the Earle of Essex forthwith landed his men vnder the Blockhouse Puntall, about a mile westward from Cadiz, whence it was thought expedient to send some Regiments to the Bridge on the West of the lland, to impeach all succours that should come from the Maine: To which seruice were sent Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard (now Lord Gerrard), and Sir Coniers Clifford with a power of twelue hundred strong. Meane while the Generall Essex with the Earle of Suffex, Count Lodowicke, Lord Harbert, Lord Burk, Sir George Carew (now Lord Carew) and others took towards Cadiz.

(272) The side of their entrance was fortified with a Wall through the necke of the Promontory from sea to sea, and a Counterskarpe raised some distance, where were built two Bulwarkes, and a Curraine for the stronger defence of the Town, the enemy hauing also an aduantage from the higher ascent, played sore vpon the English to their great annoyance, inasmuch that the forme began to giue backe from the Gate, which the Earle of Essex perceiving, to engage his souldiers resolutions, caught his owne Colours, and call them ouer the Wall into the Towne, giuing withall a most hot assault vnto the Gate, where to saue the honour of their Essex, happy was hee that could first leape downe from the Wall, and with shotte and sword make way through the thickest presse of the enemy. The Towne thus surprised, the Lord Admirall halted to second the charge, when a hot encounter ensued; for the streets were very narrow, so as but two could march on breast, and from their flat roofed houses, heapes of stones were tumbled downe, to the great hurt of many of the English, who nethlesse droue the enemy before them into the Market place, where the worthy Sir John Winkfield, fore wounded at the Gate in his thigh, was shotte with a Musket from a loope-hole of the Castle into the head, and presently died.

Proclamation was made to stay the fury of the Souldier, and the slaughter of the Spaniard, with commandement vpon paine of death, that no man should offer violence or harm to any religious person, woman or child. And such honourable care had the LL. Generals for the Inhabitants, that they sent them in their owne Pinnares vnto Porto Sancta Maria; the Ladies and Gentlewomen first, who were suffered to depart in their costliest apparel, and richest Jewels: and to saue them from the spoiles or any the least wrong of the ruder Souldiers or Seamen, the Generals themselves in persons stood at the Water sides, to see them shipped without hurt or violence.

(274) The rich Bishoppe of Cusco being taken Prisoner, without any ranfome was released, and all other of sacred Orders or Habits suffered without touch to depart: such was the heroicall Clemency of these most noble and truly-English Generals, to the great glory of our Nation, as the Spaniards themselves were forced to confesse. The Town thus won, the spoile thereof was giuen to the English Captains and Souldiers, the wearing clothes of the inhabitants onely excepted, and the Citizens compounding with the Lords Generall, to pay an hundred and twenty thousand Ducats for their ranfome, were suffered to depart: for payment whereof, forty of the chiefest Citizens, Caualleros, Clergy-men, and Merchants, were brought pledges into England till the money was paid.

(275) The like accord was attempted by the Ships which had runne themselves on ground, whose number was about fifty two, many of them Merchants, and all most richly laden, as might seeme by the offers they made; for no lesse then two millions and a halfe of Ducats were offered by them for the redemption: but the LL. Generals more minding honour and the seruice they came for, would heare of no composition but for the Merchants ships onely, which whilst it was in traile too and fro, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Admirall of Spaine, commanded them all together to be set on fire, which was suddenly done: and the flames terribly mounting, forced the pitchy smoake, as thicke cloudes to darken the Aire. Among the few were two of the Spanisht Apollies, the Mathew and the Andrew; the first of which was faued by the Lord Admirals directions, & the second was quenched by Sir Thomas Gerard, in whose bottome himselfe returned for England.

(276) Thus in an instant, a Fleet, full of men, marchandise, victuall, armour, & twelue hundred peeces of Ordinance, all valued by themselves, at twelue Millions of Ducats, was suddenly funke, consumed or taken; the Towne also ranfacked, euery Souldier bringing some portion of her rich spoiles into England, to shew the seruice he performed at Cadix. The Towne they burnt, fauing the Churches onely: the Wallies they battered, and Towers demolished, the Iland it selfe they burned, razed and spoiled, laying all waste before them, and leaving the rubbish to declare the ruines which the English had made.

The English
depart from Cadix.

(277) Vpon the fift of Iuly the Earle of Essex with his, abandoned Cadix, the Lord Admirall being gone on board some fixe dayes before; and the next day the whole Fleet set saile Westward towards Faro a Towne in Algarua; where the Earle desirous to doe some further exploit vpon the terra firma of Spaine, landed his men (the Lord Admirall on board securing the seas) and marching to Faro hee found it empty of men, the Inhabitants being fledde with much of their substance, and the Towne left destitute of victuall: yet in the Nunnery and in the Bishoppes Palace, some goods were found, and in the Library Bookes valued at a thousand Markes; and among other prizes of note, the fairest Culuerin the King of Spaine had, was there found, and seized vpon; the English foraged the Country for 3. leagues about, and burnt the towne Lotha without any resistance.

(278) Thence the first of August the LL. Generals fell before the Groine, where lying on shippes stirring, and the Seas altogether cleared; vpon the seventh of the same moneth they safely and very richly arrived at Plimouth, to the great honour of England, glory of their Queene, and renowne of their owne valours and famous adventures.

(279) But as the wrongs offered by the Spaniards, seemed to the English farre greater then was yet the reuenge: so also the most prudent Queene held it still fitt to finde King Philip more work at home, and therefore a third voyage was undertaken the yeere following, whereof Robert Earle of Essex was made as well Lord Generall for the Land, as Admirall for the sea; hauing for the once seruice, his Vice-Admirall, the Lord Thomas Howard, Knight of the Order, and his Rear-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Captaine of the Guard; for the other, his Lieutenant Generall was Charles Lord Mountjoy Knight of the Order; his Marshall, Sir Francis Vere Coronell Generall of the Low-Countries Forces; Sir George Carew Lord President of Munster, Master of his Ordinance; and Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Sergeant Maior of the field. The whole number consisted of fixe thousand men, besides Mariners, for which an hundred and twenty shippes were furnished, whereof seuteene were her Maiesties, sixty men of Warre, the rest for victuall and transportation. These vpon the ninth of Iuly were embarked at Plimouth for the Ilands of Azores, and hauing cleared fixty Leagues fell fowle by a Tempest, and were driuen backe againe to Plimouth, and againe thence set saile vpon the 17. of August next following.

(280) Vpon the fifteenth of September they fell with the Isles Flores, Euerne, Fayall, and Pikeal which submitted themselves to the Lord Generals deuotion; whence weying their Anchors, they made saile for Saint Michaels, and there before the Towne cast them againe, where it was determined that Sir Walter Rawleigh should keep the sea, whilst the Lord Generall with two thousand should land elsewhere in the Iland; which they did, and sacked the rich town Villa Franca: but the seas going high, and the Winters stormes approaching, after the spoile of those places, the destruction of a Carracke richly laden with Sugars, fired by her owne men, the taking of a Brasile man, and the surprize of three prizes which they brought into England, valued at foure hundred thousand Ducats, they returned, the Spaniard euery where hauing the worst.

(281) These stirres on the seas brought yet further mischiefs on the Spaniard, by hindring the traffike of Marchandise, as well for their owne trade & comerce with others, as for others trading into Spain; among whom Sigismund, the young and new elected King of Polonia, found himselfe most agreed: whose Ambassador for that businesse vnto the Queen, was one Paulus de Taline, a Polone Gentleman, learned, eloquent, and very audacious, (if not ouer-much) who bringing letters of credence from his King, had audience at Greenwich, her Maiefty sitting vnder her cloath of Estate, and with her Nobles, attending the summe of his message, which the Polonian beganne with more then an ordinary Grace.

(282) Whose tenour was filled with blafts of discontent, conceiued by his potent Master the King of Polonia, and caused by the greiuances of his Marchants, who not onely were deuiued of some priuiledges in England, but the sea which is made free by the Omnipotent stopped, and the trades of his Marchants into Spaine by her Highnes Edicts debarred, contrary to the law both of Nature & of Nations: that his Master as he could not be moued to diminish any part of his loue towards her Maiefty, so yet could hee not but relieue his owne subiects; and the rather for that it touched all his Nobility, whose reuencens consisted chiefly vpon the Trade of Marchandizing. That hee had hitherto forborne all meanes of re-quire, quite, though her Maiefty well knew, of meanes hee had no want; and now had need to aduertise her Highnes in a louing manner by him his Ambassador, seeing that his letters to that purpose heretofore sent, had not bene regarded, in whole name hee now required, that the seas might be open, a restitution made, and the Trade Westward to Spaine bee free, according to equity; otherwise his Master would no longer neglect his Subiects losses, but would take in hand meanes of redresse. As for her Maiesties wars with Spaine, that ought not to hinder Navigation by the common Law of Nature (as hee aouched) nor, for her respect should the ancient friendship betwixt the potent Polonian and the mighty King of Spaine bee broken, nor with the house of Austria, whose daughter his Prince had now married, which bound him in a double band of loue. But hee trusted (his Masters request bearing such equity) her Maiefty would regard it, and command satisfaction of these things forthwith to be made, to the content of his Prince, and safety of her selfe, which thing hee wished, & therof warned her Maiefty. And with otherlike wordes ended as peremptorily as hee beganne.

(283) Vnto which confident Oration, the Queen her selfe not brooking to be braued by any Prince in the World, presently made answer, preuenting the Lord Chancellor therein who was about to doe it, and both roundly and learnedly in the Latine (the same language wherein the message was deliuered) replied: the very words as neere as could bee taken from her mouth were these.

(284) Hen quàm decepta fui. Expectaui Nuncium: tu vero querelam mihi adduxisti; per literas te accepisti. Legatum, te vero Heraldum inuenio. Nunquam in vita tam ex Crationem audiui. Miror, sanè miror, tantam & tam insolentiam in publico audaciam; neque puto si Rex tuus adfesset, tanta verba protulisset: Sin aliquid tale tibi in mandatis commisit (quod quidem valde dubito) te tribuendum, quod cum Rex sit Inuenis, & non tam ture Sanguinis quam Electionis, atque etiam nouit electus, non tam bene percipiat quid inter Reges conuenit, quam Maiores sui nobiscum obseruauerunt, & alij fortasse deinceps obseruabunt. Quod at te attinet, videris multos libros perlegisse, libros tamen Principum non attigisse, neque intelligere quid inter Reges conuenit. Cum vero Ius Nature & Gentium commemoras, Hoc scito effectus nature & Gentium, ut cum bellum inter Reges intercedat, licet alteri alterius undique allata Præsidia interciperent, & ne in damnum suum conuertantur, præuidere: Hoc scito effectus Ius Nature, & Gentium; Vbi iidem Domum Austrie narras (quam iam tanti facis) non te lateat ex eadem Domo non desuisse qui Regnum Polonie regi tuo interciperet voluissent. De reliquis cum multa sunt, & singulatim deliberanda, non sunt huius loci ac temporis, accipies quod à quibusdam Consularijs huic rei designatis deliberandum fuerit. Interim valeas & quiescas.

(285) Oh how was I deceived! I looked for an Embassage, but thou hast brought me complaints; I vnderstood by thy letters that thou wert a Legate, but I finde thee an Herald; neuer since I drew breath heard I such an Oration. I maruell truly, I maruell at thy great and such vnaccustomed boldnesse in to publike an assembly; neither doe I think if the King thy Master were present, that hee would say so much: but if peradventure he hath committed any such thing to thy charge (which surely I do much doubt) it is to be imputed vnto him, that where the King is of yeers vnripe, and not by blood, but by election (yea and but newly aduanced) hee doth not so perfectly vnderstand the courle of negotiating these kind of affaires with other Princes, which either his Ancestors haue obserued with vs, or perhaps others will obserue, who afterwards shall succcede him. As touching thy selfe, indeede thou seemest to mee to haue read many Bookes, but not to haue perused the Bookes of Princes affaires, but vterly to bee ignorant what is conuenient amongst Kings. And whereas thou makest mention of the Law of Nature and Nations, know, that this is the Law both Natural and National, that when Warre is waged among Princes, it is lawfull for one of them to intercept the military helpes of the other, brought from what place soeuer, so to prevent the harms which might otherwise redound on himselfe: And this againe I auow to bee the Law of Nature and Nations. Whereas likewise thou mentionest a new affinity with the house of Austria, which now thou makest so famous, and of so deare esteeme, forget not Sir, that there haue bene of that house that would haue bereft the Kingdom of Polonia from thy King. As for other points which bee not to be spoken off at this place, and time, because they are many and generally to bee considered of one after another: thou shalt waite for such further answer as shall bee resolved on by some of my Councell, to whom I will assigne the consideration of this matter: In the meane time farewell and be quiet. And thus Lion-like rising, daunted the malepert Orator no lesse with her stately port and maiestical departure, then with the tartnesse of her princely checkes: and turning to the Traine of her Attendants, thus said; Gods death my Lords (for that was her oath euer in anger) I haue bene enforced this day to scowre vp my old Latine, that hath laine long in rusting.

(286) To entreat a Peace betwixt these Christian Princes of England and Spaine, the King of Denmarke likewise did send an Embassage vnto Queene Elizabeth, as also to deliuer the Garter worn by his Predecessor lately departed this world, with an earnest entreaty to continue the amity betwixt their two Realmes. The man was Arnald Wiisfeldt Chancellor of Denmarke, iudicious, learned, and wife, who with farre better temper and tearms well couched, deliuered his oration; which ended, hee most humbly propounded certain requests (whereunto her Maiefty presently replied) which in effect were these.

(287) 1. That the League of peace confirmed betwixt the Crownes of England & Denmark might be continued as formerly it had bene in the late deceased Kings dayes, & other his Predecessors, which now the present King his Master did instantly desire: To which hee answered: that she was most willing thereunto, wishing that the now-King would persue the same amity no worse then his Predecessors had done.

2. That whereas much Christian blood was spilt in these continuall warres betwixt England & Spain, it would please her Maiefty to giue her consent, that the King his Master might make a motion of Peace; and as hee found the occasion, so to proceede. Whereunto the replied, that hee thought his King was too young, and vnexperienced, to conueite throughly the cause of breach betwixt her and Spain; and as the League had not bene broken on her part, or with her roiall consent, so an accord should not be sought after by her, nor by any in her behalfe, for (quoth shee) I would haue the King of Denmarke, & all Princes Christian and Heathen to know, that England hath no need to craue Peace; nor my selfe endured one howre of feare since I attained the Crowne thereof, being guarded with so valiant and faithful subiects.

3. His third request was, if it stood with her Maiesties good liking, to permit open traffique, that the Marchants of Denmarke might transport their goods into Spain without danger on the narrow seas as heretofore some of them had sustained to their great losse. Her Maiesties answer was, that it was to her vnknowne, that any of his Masters good Subiects were in any wise molested, or their goods stayed, and that vpon iust prooffe thereof made, a redresse shall bee ordained, to the full satisfaction of the King, and content of his Subiects.

4. Lastly, hee was to returne the Garter, (where with her Maiefty had honoured the late deceased King) as the manner is of forraigne Princes to doe, which hee with great reuerence there deliuered; O o o o o Which

Sir Henry W. Dep. Sir Rob. Gardiner

(288) But a more dangerous Agent, working for Spainne, was the Irith Tir-Oen, who ſerpent-like lay lurking vpon his aduantage to raiſe the Standard of Rome, and to diuert ſubiectiō from the Engliſh Crowne. This mans fortunes wee haue formeſt declared, how being the ſonne of a Baſtard, or a baniſhed fugitiue, hee was raiſed by her Maieſties mee bounty to the dignitie of an Earle, and ſtood in authority ranked with the beſt; nor ſo onely, but being twice in danger of the capitall crimes (once for a murder, next for ſurping the Title of O-Neale) vpon better hopes, of other princely clemency, twice got pardon for his life. The times now dangerous, and Ireland too ready to receiue forraigne powers, it was thought conuenient to employ Sir John Norris (that famous Warriour) into thoſe parts, with thirteenth hundred of the Netherland old Souldiers, newly retired from the wars in Brittaine.

(289) Hugh Baron of Dungannon, now Earle of Tir-Oen, fearing leaſt the Engliſh would make their neſts, where himſelfe meant to build, namely in ſome Caſtle, at the mouth of Lough Earne, ſuddenly aſſailed the ſort of Blackwater, by which the entry lay into his Country, and got it by ſurrender. Which done, he wrote to Kildare, to ſide with him againſt his wrongs receiued of the Lord Deputy; yea and at the ſame inſtant, to Sir John Norris (appointed Lord General) that hee might be mildly dealt with, and not be driuen headlong vpon the dangerous rockes of diſſolualty.

(290) But how his loyalty affected vnto her Maieſty (his raiſer) was well perceiued by the powers which hee retained about him, being alwaies guarded with a thouſand horſemen, and ſixe thouſand two hundred and foureſcore foot of Viſſer, beſides two thouſand three hundred of Conaught which euer lay ready at his command; whereupon all of them being proclaimed Traitors, the flames of rebellion beganne more violently to burſt forth, which for a long time, and not without loſſe of much blood could hardly bee quenched: for though the Lord General were not inferior in ſtrength of men, yet the aduantages of the enemy were ſuch, that the time was rather ſpent in taking of booties, and fruitious Parlies, then in any memorable exploits; the one part waiting for ſitter opportunities, and the other looking euery day for his promiſed ſuccours from Spainne.

(291) But to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian blood Queen Elizabeth who euer minded Mercy more then juſtice, cauſed her Treſurer & Chiefe Juſticiar of that Kingdome, as her Commiſſioners to confer with this discontented Earle, and others his adherents, before whom Tir-Oen complained of wrongs offered him by Sir Henry Bagnall Marſhall, as well to the preiudice of his eſtate, as of his eſteeme with the Queene, the Lord Deputy, Lord General, and others, and therupon exhibited a Petitiō in humble maner containing theſe requēts. That himſelfe and all his followers might bee pardoned of their crimes, and bee reſtored to their former eſtates; that they might freely exerciſe their Romiſh Religion without moleſtation; that no Garriſon Souldiers, Shiriffe, or other Officer ſhould intercale within the iuriſdiction of his Earledome; that the Company of fifty horſemen with the Queenes pay might bee reſtored to him, in the ſame State as formerly hee had lead them; that the ſpoiles of his Country, and people might be puniſhed, and that Sir Henry Bagnall ſhould pay him a thouſand pound promiſed in Dowry with his ſiſter, whom Tir-Oen had married, and who was now deceased. Others likewiſe laid out their grieuances conceiued; ſuch were O-Dowell, Brian Mac-Hugh-Oge, Mac Mahon, and Euer Mac-Comley, who receiued moſt reaſonable anſwers to all their demands.

(292) But vnto them the Commiſſioners likewiſe propoſed certain Articles, ſay, That they ſhould forthwith lay downe their Armes, diſperſe their Forces, acknowledge ſubmiſſively their diſſolualties, admit the Queenes officers in their Gouernments, reedifie the Forts they had defaced, ſuffer the Garriſons to liue without diſturbance, make reſtitutions of ſpoiles taken, confeſſe vpon their oath how farre they had dealt with forraigne Princes, and ſinallie to renounce all forraigne aide. But theſe propoſitions not pleaſing the palate of thoſe Rebels, they departed with a reſolution to maintain their owne demands. Which moued Norris the General aided with the Lord Deputy to march with his Army vnto Armagh; whoſe approach (euer dreadful to his enemies) when Tir-Oen heard of, in great perplexity hee forſooke the Fort of Blackwater, ſet on fire the villages about, and plucked downe the Towne of Dungannon, with part of his owne houſe, bewailing his eſtate to bee paſt recovery; & was ſo much deſected in mind, as hee fought nothing elſe but where to hide his rebellious head.

(293) The Country now waſted, and no victuals to bee had, Norris ſet a Garriſon in the Church of Armagh, ſtrengthened Monahan, and proclaimed Tir-Oen Traitor in his owne territories. Which done, hee ſtayed in Viſſer without any great deeds of martiall importance, onely Tir-Oen to gaine time preſented vnto him a ſubmiſſion, ſigned with his owne hand, caſt himſelfe downe (a rare and vncouth ceremony) at the Queenes pictures feet, vngirt his ſword, and craued pardon vpon his knees: and yet in the meane time dealt hee for aides out of Spainne, and ſo far prevailed, as that Meſſengers were ſent from King Philip, with capitulations that the King of Spainne at a time prefixed ſhould ſend them a competent Army to ioine with the Irith, that all conditions of peace with the Engliſh ſhould be reſected, and that the Rebels ſhould bee furniſhed with munition from Spainne.

(294) Hereupon (though there was a ceſſation from Armes) hee fell to harry and waſt the Country, to burne villages, to drie away booties, and hauing done what hee could or would, as it were pricked in conſcience, hee once againe put on the viſard of ſimulation, and ſued for pardon and peace: which the better to effect, hee ſent the letters of king Philip's promiſes vnto the L. Deputy with the cauſes of his owne diſcontents, which moued him to doe what hee did. And ſurely ſuch was his dexterity, or his Deſtiny, or the Engliſh no leſſe dangerous, or then frequent ſecuritie, negligence and confidence, or the ſparing of money by the grand diſburſers, or the inbred lenity of the too-clement Queen, that his faire wordes were euer beleueed, and his ſoule offences pardoned: but whoſe fault ſoeuer, moſt of Conaught was now reuolted, all Viſſer rebellious, onely ſeuē Caſtles kept for the Queene.

(295) In which deſperate eſtate, Thomas Lord Burrough, a man full of courage, was ſent Lord Deputy into Ireland; who no ſooner arrived, but Norris either croſſed by ſome higher-ſwaying Powers, or by his fortune in theſe his proceedings (the ſeruices there being farre different from thoſe his others, in other parts employed) through griefe & diſcontent, (the too viſuall gerdon of many a Noble Seruitor) as was thought ended his life.

(296) The Lord Deputy no ſooner had receiued the ſword, and taken the charge of the Kingdome of Ireland, but hee made forward to meete with the Rebels, holding it good policy to cut off delays, which Propoſitions made to the Rebels.

Preparations againſt Tir-Oen.

which commonly increaſe the abilities of the enemy. Tir-Oen on the other ſide, as boldly made his reſiſtance, and in a dangerous ſeruice encountered him at the Merry, where the Lord Burrough by his valour made the way, and moſt valiantly wanne the Fort of Blackwater, (repaired and reinforced by the Rebels) the only ſtrength (beſides Woods) that the Tir-Oen had. To reſcure this Peace, immediately the enemy ſhewed himſelfe: againſt whom Henry Earle of Kildare preſently marching with a Coroner of horſe, and certaine voluntaries, (gentlemen of the better ſort) where he diſcomfited the enemy, though with loſſe of ſome men of note; as of Francis Paughan, brother to the Lord Deputies wife, Robert Turner Sergeant Maior, and the two Foster-brethren of the Earle Kildare, whoſe deaths hee tooke, as within few daies after himſelfe died for very griefe.

(297) The Fort reenforced with men and munition, and the Lord Deputy vpon ſeruice in other parts; Tir-Oen now wauering betweene hope, feare, and ſhame, thought beſt to aſſay it by ſiege, as the place of greateſt importance to further his deſignes; for that loſt, hee ſaw his fortunes muſt downe, and therupon with his ſtrongeſt power, he beleaguered it. The Lord Deputy hearing thereof, prepared ſtraightway to reſcure the place, and marching with full pace and aſſurance of victorie, whether through too forward a minde, diſtemperature of body, aie, or of bogges, arreſted hee was with ſickneſſe, and violently cut off, by vntimely death, leauing to her Maieſty a miſſe in her Irith Eſtate, and a further ſecuritie to the ranging rebellies.

(298) The gouernment of Ireland was then committed to the Earle of Ormond vnder the Title of Lieutenant General of the Armie, and vnto the Lord Chancellor Sir Robert Gardiner; vnto whom Tir-Oen (after his accuſtomed manner) in a long letter recapitulated his great grieuances, leauing not our the leaſt offence of the Souldiers, or actions of the Sheriffes; his breach of couenants with Sir John Norris hee coldly excuſeth, and laid his complaints againſt his enemies (the Engliſh) who had intercepted and ſuppreſſed his ſubmiſſion to the Queene, that they had raiſed intolerable impositions vpon the Nobles, and Commons; and that the reuenues of Ireland was ſhared among Counſellers, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Notaries; by which and other like ouertures, it was maniſeſt that hee intended to extirpate the Engliſh quite out of Ireland.

(299) All this while his Siege lay before the Fort of Blackwater; for the railing whereof, Sir Henry Bagnall (the bittereſt enemy that Tir-Oen euer had) with fourteen Enſignes of the choiſeſt troops were ſent, whom the Earle met neere vnto Armagh, and being egged on with a treſfull deſire of reuenge, bent all his force againſt the Marſhall, where beganne a bloody conflict, and was continued with the death of that worthy Souldier (fighting amongſt the thickeſt) whereby Tir-Oen obtained not onely a ioyous triumph ouer his priuate enemy, but withall went away with a glorious victory ouer the Engliſh, who neuer ſince they fiſt ſet footing in Ireland receiued ſo great an ouerthrow: for therein thirteene valiant Captaines loſt their liues, fifteene hundred common Souldiers were rowted and put to ſhamefull flight, diſparcked and cut in peeces. Vpon this diſaſter the Garriſon Souldiers (hauing with loyal hearts and weapons in hand, vnto extreame famine and exceeding diſtreſſe, held out to the laſt) laſtly ſurrendered the Pecece of Blackwater vnto the Rebels; by which ouerthrow and ſurrender, the Irith became furniſhed with armour and munition to maintain their warres, and Tir-Oen renowned all the Realme ouer, as their onely Roſe, and founder of their freedome.

(300) Himſelfe ouer-joyed with theſe gotten victories, ſwelled aboute measure with an haughty arrogancy, commanding all things as ſole Monarch of Ireland. Into Mounſter hee ſent Ounay Mac-Rory-Og-O-More with foure thouſand preying rogues, to forrage the Country, and the rable that daily reſorted vnto them, burned the houſes of the Engliſh, ranſacked their ſubſtance and killed very many; James Fitz-Thomas one of the family of the Deſmonds they let vp as Earle of Deſmond, yet ſo, that hee ſhould hold as Tenant in Fee of the O-Neale, (the Earle of Tir-Oen) and thus after a moneth, when they had kindled this fire and ſet Mounſter in a flame, they returned laden with rich booties and ſpoile. Tir-Oen in the meane time had ſent his letters to King Philip of Spainne, wherein he ſounded his victories with a full trumpe, aſſuring him that hee would heare of no peace with the Engliſh, were the conditions neuer ſo indifferent, and would for his part inuolately keepe his promiſes with the ſpaniſh King.

(301) In this deſperate eſtate ſtood Ireland when Queene Elizabeth choſe Robert Earle of Effex, to bee Lord Lieutenant and Gouernor General thereof: a Peere in regard of his approued wil dome, fortitude, and fidelity, thought fiſt to re-ſcure the detriments and loſſes therein ſuſtained, and in ſuch deere eſteeme with his Soueraigne, and intire loue of the people, as the heauens ſeemed to haue framed him for the delight of man. In whom ſhined all ſparkles of true Nobility and Marriall honor, had not fortune marred all that the other graces had made. His commiſſion was large, and authority, and led no leſſe then twenty thouſand complet Souldiers, whereof fixteene thouſand were foot, and the reſt horſe-men, ſo well furniſhed and provided, as the like had neuer bene ſeene before in Ireland.

(302) Thus honourably accompanied with the flower of Engliſh Gallants, and well-wiſhing acclamations of the people, with a ſtrange thunder-clap in a cleere Sunne-ſhine day, hee ſet forward from London, and arriving in Ireland receiued the Sword; where (toward the end of March) falling in counſell touching his affaires, it was thought fiſteſt by wiſe Statiſts, that Mounſter ſhould bee cleared of thoſe petty Rebels lying neerer, and of more validity then the remote Viſſer, of ſmall wealth and leſſe account. Whereupon, contrary to his owne opinion formerly deliuered (whiles hee was in England) and his directions from her Maieſtie, in Ireland hee made fiſt into Mounſter, and became terrible vnto the Rebelles of thoſe parts, chaſing them before him into the woods, and ſo cleared that Prouince, with more expence of time, and loſſe of men, then was heere well liked by the State.

(303) Hence hee made into Leinſter, againſt the O-Conors and O-Moiles, who had gathered head and taken Armes againſt their obedience; whom in light ſkirmiſhes hee fortunately vanquiſhed; whence he ſent Sir Camers Clifford Gouernour of Conaught one way towards Bellike, whilſt hee himſelfe tooke another way, ſo to diſtract the force of Tir-Oen. Sir Camers with a power of fifteene hundred ſtrong, marched ouer the Mountains of Curlew, where O-Rourke and his Rebels ſuddenly aſſailed them, being out-weared with trauell, and their powder neere ſpent; in which conflict, amongſt many other ſlaine, Sir Camers Clifford the teſtimony of their valours with the loſſe of their liues.

(304) The Lord General hearing of this ouerthrow, made towards Viſſer, and came into the frontiers as farre as Louth, where Tir-Oen, on the other ſide of the Riuer, from the Hillcs made his Brauado. But falling into his wonted vaine of diſſimulation, deſired a parley with the Lord Lieutenant, which hee altogether reſecting, answered, that if the Earle would conferre with him, hee ſhould find him the next morning in the head of his troops: on Robert Earle of Effex Lieutenant of Ireland.

The Earle of Effex enters Mounſter.

Sir Camers Clifford encountered with and ſlaine.

He enters Viſſer. Septem. 13.

Tir-Oen ſueth for Parley but is reſected.

on which day, when after a light skirmish, a horseman of Tir-oens troopes, with a loud voice cried, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parley vpon peace with the Lord Generall; it was againe denied him. But the next day, as the Lord Lieutenant was in his March forward, one Hagan sent from Tir-oen, met him, and declared that the Earle most humbly desired to haue the Queenes mercy and peace, and withall besought, that his Lordship would be pleased to afford him audience, which if hee would grant, then would hee with all reuerence attend him at the Foord of the Riuer not farre from Louth.

(305) To this lastly the Lord Lieutenant assented, and sent to discouer the place, and bellowing a troope of horse vpon the next Hill, came down alone vnto the Riuer; Tir-oen attending on the other side, no sooner saw his approach, but forthwith rode his horse into the Riuer vp to the saddle, and with all semblances of a dutifull respect, most reuerently saluted his Lordshippe: where, hauing had conference the space of an houre, they both returned vnto their companies. There followed the Earle of Essex, Con, a base sonne of Tir-oen, instantly intreating in his fathers name, that certaine principall men might be admitted to a conference, whereunto his honour confented.

(306) And taking with him the Earle of Southampton, Sir George Bouchier, Sir Warham St-Leger, Sir Henry Danners, Sir Edward Wingfield, and Sir William Constable, went to the Foord, where Tir-oen with his brother Cornio, Mac Gennys, Mac Guir, Euer mac Cowley, Henry Ovington, and O-Quin, attended their coming. And falling in conference, it was concluded that certaine Commissioners should the next day meet for a treaty of peace, and in the meane time there should be a cessation of warres, from fixe weekes to fixe weekes, vntill the first of May: yet so, as it might bee free on both sides, after foureene daies warning giuen, to resume hostility a fresh. And if any of Tir-oens confederates would not thereto consent, to be prosecuted at the Lord Lieutenants pleasure.

(307) But howsoeuer these his proceedings pleased the Marshallists, yet was her Maiestie highly incensed, that such expeditions had become made without her directions, being informed that the Spring, Summer, and Autumme, were spent without seruice vpon the Arch-rebell, that her men were diminished, and large summes of money consumed, without doing that for which he was sent; that by this meanes the Rebels were encouraged, and the Kingdome of Ireland laid at hazard to bee lost: Which his defaults (for so they were apprehended) were (as he conceived) much aggravated, by some that were hard against him, in her attentie care; vpon which furnish Her Maiesties sharpe letters received (though hee had excused his seruice by others whom himselfe sent at the same season) so ouerpressed his troubled thoughts, as leaving his charge to be managed by others, hee made into England, well hoping to pacifie his Soueraignes displeasure with satisfaction from his own mouth, and at Norwich had accesse to her presence, where after a short welcome, hee was commanded to his chamber; and soone after was committed to the custody of the Lord Keeper.

(308) No sooner almost was the Lord Generall departed Ireland, but that Tir-oen (notwithstanding the cessation from warre) drawing his forces together, addressed himselfe for the Field, vnto whom Sir William Warren was sent, to charge him with breach of promise; but he swelling in pride, peremptorily answered, that his doings were according to covenants, hauing giuen warning before, and his cause iust, for that the Lord Lieutenant was committed in England, vpon whose honour hee reposed his whole estate; neither would hee haue any thing to doe with the Counsellors of Ire- land, in whom (as he said) he neuer found either safety or truth. And thereupon presuming vpon Spainie, and giuing it forth that there would bee shortly an alteration in England; he sends O-Donell into Conaught, receiue such tumultuous persons, strengtheneth the weakes, and comforteth the distrustfull, glorying euery where that he would restore againe the ancient Religion, and liberty of Ireland, and expell the English from thence; to which end, some money and munition were sent him from Spainie, with indulgences from Rome; and (for an especiall fauour) the Pope sent him a plume of Phoenix feathers, for a trophy of his victories, as Vrbain long before him sent a Coronet of Peacocks tailes vnto King John, when hee was first inuested Lord of Ireland.

(309) Tir-oen thus feathered for a higher flight, Peacocks like to fiew his owne pride and greatnesse by his personall presence, vnder a religious pretext to worship a peece of the wooden Crosse of Christ, reputed to bee kept in the Monastery of the holy Crosse in Tipperary, in the mid-winter would thither on Pilgrimage; whence hee sent out Mac-Guir with a number of rifeing robbers, to despoile and prey on the peaceable subiects; with whom Sir Warham St-Leger met, and at the first race with his Lanceranne Mac-Guir through the body, and was by him runne through himselfe. Whereupon Tir-oen tearing more blowes, made ready to returne from Mounster sooner then was expected, or himselfe meant.

(310) At this time Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy (afterwards created Earle of Downshire) was sent Lord Lieutenant Generall into Ireland, who with small port and little solemnity, entred vnto the Government, the state of that Countre lying desperately disaffected, and almost past recovery. At his first coming, hearing that Tir-oen was to depart Mounster, hee hastned to stoppe his passage in Ferrell, and there to giue him Battell, which the Earle preuented by taking another way, hauing intelligence of the Lord Generals designs, but the Spring drawing on, the Deputy put himselfe on his March towards Vlster, with purpose to driue the Earle to a stand, whiles Sir Henry Docwra at Lough-foile, and Sir Matthew Morgan at Balahanon plained the Garrisons, which they with small adoe effected, and suppressed the Rebels in diuers ouerthrowes.

(311) The Lord Generall likewise held Tir-oen very hard, and with light skirmishes euer put him to the worke, so that hee now perceiving his fortune to goe backe, withdrew himselfe backe into his old corners. The Lord Lieutenant then entred into Leafe, the place of refuge and receipt of all the Rebels in Leinster, where he flew Ony-Mac-Kory-Og, chiefe of the family of the O-Mores, a bloody, bold, and desperate yong man: and so chalet out the rest of those his racheles, as that neuer since they were scene in those parts. And although in the commenning of these affaires the Equinox was past, and the winter weather begunne in that climate, yet marched he forward to the entrance of Meery three miles beyond Dondalke.

(312) The passage into Vlster is euery where naturally cumberlome, and this way made more by the Rebels, who had fortified and blocked vp the entrance with fences of flukes flucke in the ground, with hurdles ioyned together, and stones in the midst, with turfes of earth laid betwixt hills, woods, and bogges, and manned the place with a number of Souldiers: notwithstanding, the English brake through those Palladoes, and beating the enemies backe, the Lord Deputy placed a Garrison eight miles from Armagh, where in memory of Sir John Norris, hee named the Fort Mount-Norris: but to omit many other skirmishes in his returne, that at Carlingford was most famous, where the enemies assembled to stoppe his way, were all of them dif-

comited, and put to fearefull flight. (313) In the midst of Winter hee entred the glinnes, that is, the vallies of Leinster, a secure receptacle of the Rebels, where he brought into subiection Donel Spanish, Phelim Mac-Fegh, and the O-Tales, of whom hee tooke hostages. Then went he to Ferrell, and draue Tirrell, the most approoued warrior of all the Rebels, from his fastnesse, (that is his bogges and bushes,) into Vlster; the Territory of Fernes hee laid waste, spoiled Fues, and in Breeny placed a Garrison, receiuing such into mercie as deliuered vp hostages. Which done, and the Spring approaching, hee marched to Vlster, fortified Armagh, and went so farre forward, that hee remooued Tir-oen from the Fort of Blackewater, who had very artificially encamped himselfe there.

(314) As the Lord Generall was thus busied to reduce Ireland to obedience, so the Pope and Spainie studied to hold vp Tir-oen, and to maintaine the rebellions; their Agents were a Spaniard, elected by the Pope, Arch-Bishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Cloufort, the Bishoppe of Killaloe, and Ascher a Iesuite. These by prayer, and promises of heavenly rewards, wonne Philip to send succours into Ireland, which forthwith hee did, vnder his Generall Don John D'Aquila, a man of a conceited hope that all would bee his, as confident of much aid from the titular Earle Desmond, and from Florence Mac-Carty, a rebell of great might; where in hee was deceived; for Sir George Carew, Lord President of Mounster, had preuented that designe, and sent them prisoners to England, where they were kept sure.

(315) Don D'Aquila with two thousand Spaniards, all of them old trained Souldiers, with certaine Irish Fugitiues, landed at Kinsale in Mounster, the last of October, and straightwaies published a writing, wherein hee gloriously stiled himselfe with this Title, Master Generall, and Captaine of the Cathelike King in the warres of God, for holding and keeping the faith in Ireland; endeavouring to make the world beleue, that Queene Elizabeth, by the definitiue sentences of the Popes, was deprived of her Kingdomes, and her subiects absolved and freed from their Oath of allegiance, and that hee was come to deliuer them out of the Diuels lawes, and the English tyrannie, vpon which suggestions many discontented and wicked persons beganne to bandy on his side.

(316) The Lord Deputy gathering his Companies, hasted to Kinsale and encamped nere vnto the Towne on the Land side, whiles Sir Richard Lewison with two of the Queenes Shippes inclosed the Haven, to forbidde all access to the Spaniard; when from both sides, the thundering Canon playd vpon the Towne; but newes being brought that two thousand Spaniards more were arrived at Bere-hauen, Baltimore, and Casle-hauen, Sir Richard was employed vpon them, in which seruice hee sunke five of their Shippes.

(317) Vnto these new landed Spaniards, whose Leader was Alphonso O-Campo, O-Donell ouer the ice, by speedy iourneys and unknown by-waies repaired; vntoene of the English; and a few daies after Tir-oen himselfe, with O-Rocke, Raimund Burke, Mac-Mahon, Randall Mac-Surley, Tirrell the Barron of Lixnaw, and the most selected choice of all the Rebels came vnto them, who mustered together made fixe thousand foot, and five hundred horse; all confident of victory, as being fresh, strong, and exceeding in number, where, the English were outwared through winter siege, with scarcity of victuall, and their horse weak with frost and rauen.

(318) In this hope Tir-oen, vpon an Hill not a mile from the English Campe, made a Brauado two daies together, intending to haue put these new supplies of Spaniards, with eight hundred Irish, by night into Kinsale, as by letters intercepted from

Don D'Aquila did appeare. Which to preuent, the Lord Deputy appointed eight Ensignes to keepe watch, and himselfe with the President of Mounster, and the Marshall, at the foot of the Hill, chose out a conuenient plot to giue the Earle battell, who the next morning seeing the English so forward, by his bag-pipers founded the retreat, whom the Lord Generall followed, and forced them to stand in the brincke of a bogge, where there horsemen were disorderd and rowted by the Earle of Clam-Ricard.

(319) The maine battell then wauering in feare, was violently charged by the Lord Deputy himselfe, who in his directions discharged the part of a worthy Commander, and in fighting, the office of a valiant Souldier; for the Rebels not able to withstand his fury, brake their arrayes, and in disorder confusedly fled, in whose pursuite many of them felt the reuenging edge of the English sword. Tir-oen, O-Donell, and the rest flung away their weapons, and saved their liues by flight; but Alphonso O-Campo, with three other Spanish Captaines, and fixe Ensigne-bearers, were taken prisoners, nine of their Ensignes borne away by the English, and twelue hundred of his Spaniards slaine; such welcome found these new guests in Ireland. This victory obtained, both quelled the pride of the intruding Spaniards, and exceedingly daunted the hearts of the disloyall Irish; so that Tir-oen was forced into his starting holes in Vlster, O-Donell driuen into Spainie, and the rest of that rebellious rabble scattered into obscure places, where their best succour was to play least in fight.

(320) The Lord Generall, returning to the siege of Kinsale, beganne to raise rampires, and to mount his Canons neerer the Towne, wherein fixe daies were spent without any impeach from the Spaniard, whose courage being cut by the losse of their fellows, fought rather how to gette cleare and bee gone, then to aduerture resistance against such a warlike oppoler. D'Aquila hereupon, sent his letters by his Drumme Major, to the Lord Deputy, wherein hee craued, that some Gentleman of credit might be sent into the Towne, with whom he might Parley for a peace. Whereunto his Lordship inclined, and to that end sent thither Sir William Godolphin.

(321) Vnto whom D'Aquila signified, that hee had found the Lord Deputy, though his eager enemy, yet an honourable person; the Irish of no valor, rude and vnciuill, yea and (that which hee sore feared) perfidious and false; That hee was sent from the King of Spainie his Master to aid two Earles, and now hee much doubted whether there were any such in Recrum natura, considering that one tempestuous puffe of warre had blowne the one of them into Spainie, and the other into the North, so as they were no more to bee seen: willing therefore hee was to treat about a Peace, that might bee good for the English, and not hurtfull to the Spaniards; albeit hee wanted nothing requisite to the holding out of the Siege, and expected every day out of Spainie fresh supplies to finde the English work, and trouble enough.

(322) The matter thus proposed, and the English weak and weary through a long Winters siege, the Lord Deputy consented to an agreement, the Articles whereof were these.

1 That John D'Aquila should quite the places which he held in the Kingdome of Ireland, atwell in the Towne of Kinsale, as the Forts and Castles of Baltimore, Berehauen, and Casle-hauen; and should deliuer them vnto the Lord Deputy, or to whom he should appoint.

2 That Don D'Aquila and his Spaniards should depart with armes, money, munition, and banners displayed, the Souldiers notwithstanding to beare no armes against the Queene of England, till such time as they were vnshipped in some part of Spainie.

John Stow. Conclusions of peace.

3 That Shippes and victuals should be granted vnto them in their departure, for their money, and at such reasonable prizes as the Countrey could afford.

4 That if contrary winds inforced them into any other Port of Ireland, or else into England, they might be intreated as friends with safety of harbor, and prouisions necessary for their money to further their departure.

5 That a cessation should be from warre, a security from iniuries, and victual granted at reasonable rates, whiles they remained in preparing for Spaine.

6 That the Ships in which they should bee imbarcked might freely passe by other English Shippes without molestation; and the Shippes arrived in Spaine, might safely retorne backe without any impeachment of the Spaniards: for security whereof, the said D'Aquila should deliuer for hostages, such three of their Capitaines as the Lord Deputy would chuse. Vnto these Articles Don Iohn solemnly swore on the behalfe of the Catholike King his Master, and with his hand subscribed his name, Don Iohn D'Aquila.

(323) The troublesome cloude of most likely dangers, thus dissolved in Mounsters faire Aire, the coasts of Ireland were shortly cleared of those foraine intruders, who notwithstanding their former great bragges, with shame and dishonour imbarcked themselves for home, their companies being much empaiored, and proud spirits brought downe. And now the Ben-baddad Tir-oen, who had boasted all Ireland was his, with fearefull flights and by-waies recovered his lurking holes in Wilder: after he had lost most of his men, whom the twelving and violently-running Riuer, by reason of Winter floods, had swallowed vpp; where his traitors head, burdened with the dreads of his owne defects, could take no rest, no rest so much as to breath without feare, distrustfull euer shadow that hee saw, and shifting out of one by-corner before hee well knew where to find another.

(324) Meane whiles, the Lord Deputy refreshed his weary and winter beaten Souldiers, repayed the decays, and renewed the Garisons in Mounster, which done, hee departed for Dublin, where wearing out the winter tormes, towards the spring, by a gentle and easie march, well appointed, hee returned into Wilder, meaning to belay the Rebel on euerie side, by planting his Forts, so to take him in his toile. Thus being approached vnto Blackewater, hee transported his Armie ouer the Foord vpon floates, vpon whose banke, beneath the old Fort, he erected a new, to such terror of the Arch-rebell, as hee fet on fire his owne house at Dunganon, and got himselfe further from danger; whether the Lord Deputy immediately marched, and made spoile without any spare; the corne fields were destroyed, the Villages fired, and booties brought in on euerie side. The Forts in Lough Crew, Lough Reagh, and Mogher Lecomd, were yielded vp, and Garisons placed in Lough Eagh or Sydney, and in Monaghan, whence with their continuall sallies, they crossed the enemies, that fecing themselves inuironed about, and no way open for escape, like wilde beasts they hid their heads in the thickets, forrests, and woods, muttering complaints against their late magnified Tir-oen; exclaiming he had engaged the ruine of the whole Nation, for his owne priuate discontents, and that these warres, howeouer beneficiall to him, yet were they most pernicious vnto them, whereupon changing their mindes with their fortunes, beganne a vie, who should be first in shewing their alteration, by coming in to the Deputy.

(325) The Earle not ignorant how their affections declined, his owne forces shaken, and the fidelity of his followers more and more suspected, hee once more determined to prevent the worst, by his submission, which in humble letters he sent to the Queene, wherein with prayers and teares hee craved pardon of his faults: to such an ebbe was the swelling tides of his rebellious heart brought. Her Maiesty (whose Nature was Mercy) euer distastefull of bloud, gaue the Lord Deputy authority to pardon his life, though hardly drawn to remit his offences, they being so many and great: His friends that affected him, and Mac Baren his brother, daily solicited the Deputy for his peace, which lastly, vpon an absolute promise, to put his life and reuenues, without any condition, to the will of the Queene, was granted; and at Melifont, accompanied with two persons and no more, had access into the Chamber of Presence, where the Lord Deputy fate in a Chaire of Estate, most of his Marshallists standing about him.

(326) Tir-oen, in bafe and poore array, with a dejected countenance at the very entrance fell down vpon his knees, and so rested till hee was commanded to arise, and come neerer; when stepping forward a few paces, hee fell againe prostrate, and like a most humble Supplicant, in words well couched (as cunning hee was both in speech and action) acknowledged his sinnes against God, and fault vnto her Maiesty; and thus beganne his submission to the Lord General.

*In the royall clemency of my dread Soueraigne and most gracious Queene, I doe only lay the hope and rest of my now remaining estate, vnto whose pleasure I absolutely remis my life, and whole reuenues; and doe most submissively deprecate mine owne misery, beseeching againe her mercy, whose boundlesse fauours I haue heretofore, and mighty powers now of late both felt and found, and well hope, that the fontaine of her ever-flowing graces are not drawn dry. Let mee (I pray) bee the subiect, wherein her mercy may worke, and an example for euer of her mild clemency, both to diuulge her Princelie lenity, and to redeme in some part the honor I haue lost. For age I am not so vnconquerable, nor of body so vnable, neither in courage so dejected, but that my faithfull seruice in her behalfe, may expiate and make some measure of satisfaction, for these my many and most disloyall rebellions. And yet I may iustly complaine, that through the malicious enuy of some, I haue beene hardly and vnfriendly dealt with, which may somewhat extenuate my crime and offence: For But as he was enforcing this point further, the Lord Deputy interrupted his speech, and with a few words deliuered with great authority, (which in a Marshallist stands in stead of Eloquence) told him, that there was no excuse to be heard, his crimes were too great; and thereupon commanded him to depart the Presence: which he did with a countenance seeming very heauy and sad. The next day departing for Dublin, hee tooke Tir-oen thither, meaning to transport him for England, had not the death of the Queene hindered his designe. These things premised, and Ireland thus recovered that was in hazard to be lost, let vs returne to our English affaires, from whence these Irish bogges haue detained vs too long.*

(327) On what termes the Earle of Essex left Ireland we haue already heard, and to what lamentable successe the height of his life brought him, is now to bee related; wherein hee may be the example of fortunes daliance, and of the vnstayed felicity had in this life; a man indeede filled with the affection of his Prince & the people, & fraught with honourable habilites to purchase both, vntill by his owne vnadvisednesse (for so it must needs be censured) hee clouded his honour, wisdom, and loyalty, with the shadowes of his owne discontents. Whether his Soueraignes fauours were the wings of his ambitions, or the dependencies of men of warre, the pillars of his high hopes, I doe not censure; but that some secret vnder-workings gaue fire to his passionate discontents, I doubt not, hauing seene his owne letters penned in that behalfe. Howeouer, sure it is, the Eie of Ielousie now lastly attended him, and his doings were more noted, then was made shew of: wherefore, being yet in Ireland with an eminent authority, followed with the flower and chiefest men of warre, and suspected to be too well respected by the Arch-rebell Tir-oen, it was held good policy (vpon another pretended occasion) to multer forces, and to make a Lord Lieutenant General of all England, which was, the right honorable Charles Howard Earle of Nottingham Lord high Admirall.

(328) The shew of this preparation was a pre-empting prouidence (as was pretended) against a Spanish Navy in new rigging for the Seas; and indeed such preparation in that Summer was made, as the like had not bene in England since Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne. For London was allotted to furnish fixteene Ships to the Seas, and six thousand Souldiers for the Land seruice, whereof three thousand were to rest euer in a readinesse, and the other three thousand (all of them householders) to attend and guard her Maiesties roiall Person. And out of many Countreies adioyning, such numbers of braue horie and horsemen were gathered, as neuer till then had bene seene; the fame whereof was so farre spread, as neither Spaine, nor any other, could haue any heart to make attempt this way.

(329) But the Earle of Essex arriving in England not onely peaceably, but also very priuately and vnaccompanied (as hath bene saide) and now remaining in the Lord Keepers custody, was often and seriously dealt with, by that truly honourable and prouident Statist (of whom hee was intirely affected) somewhat to decline his lofty soaring, left in mounting too high, he should melt his waxen wings against the hot Sunne, and not to suffer the fore to fester till it were past cure; to which purpose also he afterwards wrote him a letter of pithy and sapient perfwasions, out of the abundance of his well-wishing heart; the copy whereof we held worthy to bee here presented.

The Lord Keeper to the Earle of Essex Iulie 18. An. 1598.

(330) My very good Lord. It is often seene, that a stander by seeth more then hee that playeth the game; and for the most part euery man in his owne cause, standeth in his owne light, and seeth not so cleerly as hee should. Your Lordshippe hath dealt in other mens causes, and in greate and weighty affaires with great wisdom and iudgement; now your owne is in hand, you are not to contemne or refuse the aduise of any that loueth you, how simple soeuer. In this order I range my selfe; of those that loue you none more simple, and none that loue you with more true and honest affection: which shall pleade mine excuse, if you shall either mistake, or misconfer, my words or meaning. But in your Lordships honorable wisdom I neither doubt nor suspect the one or other. I will not presume to aduise you, but I will shoot my bolt, and tell you what I thinke. The beginning and too-long continuing of this vnreasonable discontent you haue seene and proued, by which you may see at the end. If you hold still this course (which hitherto you finde to bee worse and worse, and the longer you goe, the farther out of the way) there is little hope, or likelihood that the end will bee better. You are not yet so farre gone, but you may well returne; the returne is safe, the progresse dangerous and desperate.

In this course you hold, if you haue any enemies, you doe that for them which they could neuer doe for themselves. Your friends you leaue open to storme and contempt; you forsake your selfe, and overthrow your fortunes, and ruinate your honour and reputation. You giue that courage and comfort to the forreine enemies, as greater they cannot haue. For what can bee more welcome, or more pleasing newes vnto them, then to heare that her Maiesty and the Realme are maymed of so worthy a member, who hath so often and so valiantly quelled and danted them. You forsake your Countrey, when it hath most neede of your counsell or helpe. And lastly, you faile in that indissoluble duty which you owe to your most gracious Soueraigne. A duty imposed vpon you, not by nature or policy onely, but by that religious and sacred bond, wherein the diuine Maiesty of almighty God hath by the rule of Christianitie obliged you.

For the foure first, your constant resolution may perhaps moue you to esteeme them as light; but being well weighed they are not light, nor lightly to bee regarded. And for the two last, it may bee that the clearenesse of your inward conscience, may seeme to content your selfe. But that is not enough; these duties stand not onely in contemplation, or in inward meditation: their effects bee externall action, and when that faileth, the substance faileth.

This being your present state and condition, what is to bee done? what is the remedy? My good Lord I lacke wisdom and iudgement to aduise you; but I will neuer lacke an honest true heart to wish well, nor (being warranted by a good conscience) will faile to speake what I thinke.

I haue begunne plainly, bee not offended if I proceede so. Bene cedit, qui cedit temporis. Since faith well, Lex si nocentem punit, cedendum est iusticie; si innocentem, cedendum est fortune. The medicine and remedie is, not to contend and strive, but humbly to yeelde and submit. Haue you giuen a cause, and yet take a standall vnto you? Then all you can doe, is too little to make satisfaction. Is cause of standall giuen vnto you? yet policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to sue, yeelde, and submit, to your Soueraigne, betwene whom and you there can bee no proportion of duty. When God requirer it as a principall duty and seruice to himselfe; and when it is euident, that great good may ensue of it to your friends, your selfe, your Countrey, and your Soueraigne, and extreme harme by the contrary: there can bee no dishonour or hurt to yeelde, but in not doing of it, is dishonour and impiety.

The difficulty (my good Lord) is to conquer your selfe, which is the height of true valour and fortitude; wherein to all your honorable actions haue intended. Doe it in this, and God will bee pleased, her Maiesty (I doubt not) well satisfied: your Countrey will take good, and your friends take comfort by it; and your selfe (I mention you last, for I know that of all these, you esteeme your selfe least) shall receive honour, and your enemies (if you haue any) shall be disappointed of their bitter-sweete hopes.

I haue deliuered what I thinke, simply and truly; and leaue you to determine according to your wisdom. If I haue erred, it is Error amoris, not Amor erroris. Construe and accept it (I beseech you) as I meane it; not as an aduise, but as an opinion, to bee allowed or cancelled at your pleasure. If I might conueniently haue conferred with your selfe in person, I would not haue troubled you with so many idle blots. Whatsoeuer you iudge of this mine opinion, yet bee assured my desire is to further all good meanes that may tend to your good, and so wishing you all honourable happinesse, I rest your Lordshipps most ready and faithfull, though vnable, poore friend.

The Earles Answer.

(331) My very good Lord. Though there is not the man this day liuing, whom I would sooner make a Iudge of any question that did concerne mee, then your selfe: yet you must giue me leaue to tell you, that in some cases I must appeale from all earthly Iudges; and if in any, then surely in this, when the highest Iudge on earth hath imposed vpon mee the heaviest punishment, without triall or hearing. Since then I must either answer you Lordships arguments, or forsake mine owne iust defence, I will force mine aking head to doe mee seruice for an hour.

I must first deny my discouragement, which was forced, to be an humorous discontentment, and in that it was vn-fascioable, and is too long continuing, your Lordshippe should rather condole with mee, then exfoliate. Naturall feasons are expected here below, but violent and vn-fascioable stormes come from above: there is no tempest to the passionate indignation of a Prince, nor that at any time so vnfascioable, as when it lighteth on those that might expect an harvest of their painefull and carefull labours. Hee that is once wounded must feele smart till his hurt is cured, or the part senselesse; but cure I expect none, her Majesties heart being obdurate; and be without sense

I cannot. But then (you say) I may ayme at the end. I doe more then ayme, for I see an end of all my fortunes, and have set an end to all my desires. In this course doe I anything for mine enemies? when I was present, I found them absolute, and therefore I had rather they should triumpe alone, then have mee attendant upon their Chariot.
Or doe I leane my friends? when I was a Courtier, I could yeeld them no fruit of my love to them; now I am an Heremite, they shall beare no enuie for their love to me.
Or doe I forsake my selfe, because I doe enjoy my selfe? Or doe I overthrow my fortunes, because I build not a fortune of paper walles, which euery puffe of winde blowes downe? Or doe I ruinate mine honor because I leane following the pursuit, or wearing the false mark of the (ha-dow of honour? Doe I giue courage or comfort to the forraigne enemies, because I reserve my selfe to encounter them, or because I keepe mine heart from basenesse, though I cannot keepe my fortune from declining? No, no, I giue euery one of these considerations his due right, and the more I weigh them, the more I finde my selfe iustified from offending in any of them. As for the two last objections, that I forsake my Country when it hath most need of mee, and faile in that indissoluble duty which I owe to my Soueraigne: I answer, that if my Country had at this tyme of my publike seruice, her Majesty that gouernes it would not haue drinen me to a priuate life.

I am tied to my Country by two bands; one publike, to discharge carefully, faithfully, and industriously that trust that is committed vnto mee, and the other priuate to sacrifice for it my life and carcase which haue bene nourished in it. Of the first I am free, being dismissed or disabled by her Majesty. Of the other, nothing can free me but death, and therefore no occasion of performance shall offer it selfe, but I will meete it halfe way. The indis-soluble duty which I owe to her Majesty, is the dutie of alleagiance which I will neuer, nor can faile in, the dutie of attendance is no indissoluble duty. I owe her Majesty seruice of an Earle, and of a Marshall of England. I haue bene contented to doe her the seruice of a Clarke, but can neuer serue her as a villaine, as a slave. But yet (you say)
I must giue way to time: so I doe, for now I see the storme come, I haue put my selfe into the harbour. Seneca saith, wee must giue way to fortune. I know that fortune is blind and strong, and therefore I goe as farre out of the way as I can. You say the remedy is not to strine, I neither strine nor seek for remedy, but I must yeeld and submit: I can neuer yeeld my selfe to be guilty, or this imposition lately laide vpon me, to be iust: I owe so much to the Author of truth, as I can neuer yeeld truth to be falsehood, or falsehood to be truth. Haue I giuen cause (you aske) and take a scandall? No, I gaue not cause to take vp so much as Fimbrius his complaint, for I did totum telum corpore accipere. I patiently beare all, and sensibly feele all that I then receiued. When this scandall was giuen mee, may, when the worst of all indignities are done vnto mee, doth Religion enforce me to serue? doth God require it? is it impiety not to do it? why? cannot Princes erre? cannot subjects receiue wrong? is an earthly power or authority infinite? Pardon mee, pardon mee my Lord, I can neuer subscribe to these principles: but Salomons foole laughs when he is stricken: Let these that mean to make their profite by Princes faults, shew to haue no feare of Princes iniuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite absolutenes in earth, that doe not beleue in an absolute infinitenes in heauen. As for mee, I haue receiued wrong,
I feele it, my cause is good I know it. And whatsoeuer come, all the powers on earth can neuer shew more strength and constancy in oppressing, then I can shew in suffering.

whatsoeuer shall be imposed vpon mee.

Your Lordship in the beginning of your letter made your selfe a looker on, and mee a player of mine owne game; so you may see more then I: but you must giue mee leaue to tell you in the end of mine, that since you but see and I suffer, I must of necessity feele more then you. I must craue your Lordships patience, to giue him that hath a crabbed fortune leaue to use a crabbed stile. But whatsoeuer my stile is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected towards your Lordship, then that of your Lordships poore friend

R. ESSEX.

(332) The distempered humor discovering it selfe in this letter, argueth both the depth of his fettered discontent, and the danger of giuing way to violent passions, which not onely deprive the wisest of the vlt of their owne vnderstanding, but also blinde their eyes that they cannot see, nor apprehend the benefite of other mens faithfull counells. Notwithstanding, it pleased her gracious Highnesse (whom he so censured as wronging him, for lending a more attentiu care to his enemies suggestions, then to his owne satisfactions) first, to remitte his durance to his owne house, and then loth to looke into his faults but with her princely eye of fauour to proceed vnto some moderate censure of his actions, to the end hee might see his owne errors, and see to limit his power as her owne might be secured.

(333) To which end hee assigned certain of her Priuy Councell to conuent him concerning the breaking of his former instructions for the North-Irish prosecution, and the manner of his treating with Tir-Oen, his coming from Ireland, and leaving that Kingdome contrary to her Majesties expresse commandement, signed vnder the Royall Hand and Signet. Whereunto his answer was, that the State of Warre held it a Maxime, to make good the Stand before the Remoue, and that it was nothing at Table to direct, but another thing in field to effect, especially in Ireland, whose war was with Eggs and Woods, as well as with Men. And to the rest of the objections hee answered with such obedient discretion, and loyall submission, as hee well satisfied the Honourable presence, onely a suspension from the exercise of some of his Offices was decreed, vntill her Majesties pleasure should otherwise order it. Shortly after hee was let at full liberty; the Queene sending him word that shee well hoped his surest guard would now bee his owne discretion.

(334) But seeing his wonted greatnesse restrained, though the scope of his liberty was thus farre enlarged, he presently mounted higher with the wings of discontent: for deprived of Offices, neglected in Court, and all his forraigne seruices powred into her Majesties lappe, was now (as he imagined) there wrapped vp, and laide in obliuion. Neither were these his grieuances lessened by his military followers, who dayly watred these ill set plants with their exasperated complaints, till they were sprung to some height, and still to nourish their sappe, many projets were cast, and conferences held how to lop off other branches, which as they feared would hinder their growth, till lastly, at Drury house they agreed on the manner (O had it withered before it had blowmed, or died in the grafting before itooke sappe) which was by violent hand to bring the Earle into her Majesties presence, and to remoue from her such as they deemed his opposites.

(335) The frequent assembly vnto Essex house
by Noblemen, Knights, Captaines, and others, was presently obscured by the Statists in Court, to stoppe the current of which confluence before it grew to a flood, Secretary Herbert was sent from her Majesty to require him to repaire before the Lords of her Councell, then assembled at Salisbury Court, which hee excusing with sicknesse, neglected to do, and the same night vpon some sinister reports set a double watch about him, pretending some danger to bee meant to his person. For whose defence the next morning (being Sunday) many repaired vnto his house, among whom, as chiefe were the Earles of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Santes and Montague, accompanied with a Troupe of gallant Gentlemen their followers.

(336) Her Maiefty hearing of these disorderlie proceedings, in her princely wisdomethought to cast water vpon this beguine fire, before it brake forth into flame, and thereupon sent foure men of much honour vnto his place, to offer him iustice for any grieues, and to command the assembly to depart.
The persons sent were the L. Keeper of the great Seale, the Earle of Worcester, Sir Francis Knowles his vnkle, and the Lord Chiefe Iustice of England, all of them in high honour and fauour with the Earle himselfe.

(337) These coming to his house without Temple-barre, were receiued in themselves, but scarce any of their seruants suffered to follow, excepting the Bearer of the Purse and Seale, where finding the Court full of those his followers, the Lord Keeper putting off his hatte, tolde them that they were sent by her Maiefty to vnderstand the cause of this their assembly, and to let them know, that if they had any particular cause of grieue against any person whatsoeuer, they should haue hearing and iustice. The Earle of Essex answered that his life was sought after, and that hee had bene perfidiously dealt withall. To which the Lord Chiefe Iustice replied, that if any such matter was attempted, it was fitt for him to declare it, assuring him of a faithfull relation, and that her Ma-iesty would doe him iustice. Which promises the Lord Keeper seconded, and desired the Earle to declare his grieues, if not openly, yet in priuate, and he doubted not but to procure him full satisfaction, &
then turning towards the multitude, with a louder voice said; I do command you all vpon your alleageance to lay down your Weapons, and so depart. Whereupon the Earle himselfe went into his Booke-chamber, these foure Councillors following him in hope of priuate conference; but so farre off was hee from hearing them further, or answering to their demands, that leauing them there vnder sure custody, hee returned to his other attendants.

(338) With whom in tumultuous manner, hee made into London, his followers crying, that the Earle of Essex should haue bene murdered by Cobham, Cecil and Rawley, all men amazed what this did meane. Thus past hee from Ludgate through Chesepside, into Fan-church street, where hee entred
the house of a supposed friend (then one of the Shiriffes) who seeing the multitude, auoided himselfe out at a backe-dore, when presently in diuers parts of the City Essex was proclaimed a Traitor, to the no lesse grieue of the Citizens, then feares of his followers, and thence returning with a Halbert in his hand, and a Table-napkin about his necke, came into Gracious street, where a while hee made his stand, (the Lord Maior and others being assembled at the upper end towards Leaden-hall) no one Citizen or seruant shewing him any signe of assistance. The case so desperate, one of the principall offenders contriued how by redeeming his fault, to saue his owne life; who hastening into the Strand to Essex-house, and comming to Sir John Duns, as being sent from the Earle, gat release of the foure Councillors, vnder whose guard they had bene hitherto kept.

(339) Essex now despairing of all succours in London, saw it was bootlesse there to make his abode, & therefore retired againe towards Pauls, meaning to passe Ludgate the way that he came, but being resisted by a company of Pikemen, and other forces, made by that stout and noble Prelate, the then Lord Bishoppe of London, hee was put backe, Sir Christopher Blunt foreburch, and young Traey slaine;
besides some others on the Queenes part, himselfe narrowly escaping, being thrust through the hatte

with a pyke. So hence againe returning, at Queene Hue hee tooke boate, bidding the City and his fortunes adue.

(340) His enterprize thus frustrate, with a mind distracted hee rowed vp the riuier, and landed at the Water-gate of his owne house; which hee presently fortified; and the Lord Admirall assaulted, suffering notwithstanding the Countesse of Essex, the Lady Rich and their Gentlewomen to depart, which done, hee forced the Garden euen to the walles of the house. Some resistance was made, and some persons slaine vpon either part, which the Earle perceiving, presently yeelded, desiring onely that hee might bee ciuilly vld, and that hee might haue an honourable triall, and so being first brought to Lambeth-house, where an howre or two hee remained with the Lord Archbishoppe (his euier most louing, but then most mournfull friend) was thence with some other Lords and Gentlemen conuayed by water to the Tower, about tenne of the clocke the same night: hauing then experience, that vaine is the loue of the Commons to a subiect (how great soeuer) when it is counterbalanced with the dutifull obedience vnto their Prince.

(341) Vpon the nineteenth of the same mo-neth, the Earle of Essex and Southampton were arraigned at Westminster, the Lord Buckhurst Lord high Treasurer of England being made Lord Steward for the day, where the great resolution of the one, con-temning death, and the sweet temper of the other well deferring life, did breed most compassionate affections in all men, hearing the sentence of law to passe vpon them. The one of them remained prisoner in the Tower during the raigne of the Queene, and by the gracious clemency of our Soueraigne Lord King James at his comming to the Crowne, had pardon of life, and restauration of blood, the other (Essex) the five and twentieth of February being Ashwedsday, suffered vpon the Greene within the Tower, rendering his soule to God with a most penitent and Christian constancie, whose last speeches were to this effect.

(342) "My Lords and Christian brethren, who are present witnesses of my iust punishment, I confesse (to Gods glory) my selfe a most wretched sinner, and that my finnes in number exceed the haire of my head; that good which I would haue done, that did I not, and the euill which I would not, that did I. For all which I beseech my Sauour Christ to be a Mediator to his Father my God, especially for this my last sinne, this great, this crying, this bloody, this infectious sinne, wherein, through loue of mee, so many haue bene drawn to offend God, their Soueraigne, and the world. I beseech God, her Majesty, and the State, to forgive vs; and I beseech him to blesse her with a prosperous raigne, with a wife and vnderstanding heart, to blesse the Nobles and Ministers of the Church and State.
I likewise beseech you, and all the world, to hold

Ex Libro Inscript. Proceedings against Traitors.

The Popes Bulls sent to Garnet to prohibit succession, unless he were a Catholic.

Christ would not be Judge of the inheritance betwixt Brethren: his Vicar will against all right.

Pole with His attractive power, long before had drawn the Needle of the Southerne Compass vnto that One point.

(2) Immediately vpon the death of the Queene, the Lords of the Land gaue full satisfaction vnto the people, in proclaiming JAMES THE SIXTH, King of Scotland, by the name of JAMES THE FIRST KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH &c. to the vinepeakeable comfort of all true English, as well for his unquestionable claime, as for that hee professed the same true Religion (whose preservation was their tender care) as also for his singular learning and experience, whereby hee was accomplished to vndergoe the managing of so great an Empire, having now attained to thirty fixe yeeres, nine monethes, and fve dayes, exercised altogether in the practise of Kingly gouernement, from the very first dayes of his infancy.

(3) That his Title was most iust, no man can deny, being sprung from the vnitied Roles of Lancaster and Yorke, King Henry the seventh, and Queene Elizabeth his wife: whose Issue by the Male failing in the late deceased Queen Elizabeth of glorious memory, the offspring of Margaret her eldest daughter, was the next heire, which Lady married vnto James the fourth King of Scotland; by him had issue King James the fifth, whose only Daughter Queene Mary was Mother of this our mighty Monarch. Let Daleman therefore doe vpon his own dreames, and other like Traitors fashion their barres vpon the Popes forge; yet hath God & his right set him on the throne of his most lawfull inheritance, so to vnitie the two Crowns into one: Gods omnipotent arme bringing at last that to passe, which had often bene assayed, but could not be effected by any power of man. For, did not Edward our first, the terror of Syria, and Edward the first our godly Iosias, both of them distresse Scotland with their warres, only to haue made an vnion by the marriages of the next heire, and of their Queene? But the time being not come, and all other preceding Princes failing of their purposes, the peaceable vnion of those two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, as also of two other, France and Ireland was referred for Him, who is a patterne of all princely Learning and Piety, vnto all other Monarches vpon the surface of the Earth.

(4) But these calme proceedings without any oppugnancy, as they were most ioyfull to the English, so were they admirable vnto other forraigne Nations, yea, and enuid at of some, especially, such as hoped for an alteration, or at leastwise a toleration of Religion. And so much the rather, for that Pope Clement the eight, had sent the yeere before vnto Henry Garnet, Superiour of the Iesuites in England, two Bulles to the contrary; one to the Clergy, and the other to the Laitie. The title of the former was, Dilectis filijs Archiepiscopis, & reliquis Clero Anglicano, &c. the later, Dilectis filijs Principibus, & Nobilibus, Catholicis Anglicanis, salutem & Apostolicam Benedictionem: the summe of both thus. To our beloued sonnes, the Archbishops and the Clergy, the Peeres and Nobles, Catholics of England, greeting, and Apostolicall Benediction, &c. The tenor was, that after the death of her Maiefty, whether by course of Nature, or otherwise: Whosoeuer should lay claime or title to the Crowne of England, though neuer so directly, and neuerly interested by descent, should not be admitted vnto the thronet, unless he would first tolerate the Romish Religion, and by all his best endeouours promote the Catholic cause, vnto which, by a solemne and sacred Oath, he should religiously subscribe, after the death of that Miserable woman, for so it pleased his Holinesse to teame Elizabeth, that most great and happy Queen. By vertue of which Bulls, (if vertue may be in any such vicious Libels) the Iesuites dissuaded the Romish-minded Subjects from yielding (in any wise) obedience vnto King James, as being not an obedient Catholic sonne; but this not working to their wished effect, and he now solemnly proclaimed with an vniuersall applause, loue and peace, their hopes beganne to grow cold, and no succours from Spain being now to be expected, Garnet the Superiour to auoid further dangers, sacrificed these hunger-starved Bulls to Falcan the fiery God.

(5) King James in Scotland receiuing intelligence of the most plausible passages to this enlargement of his Stile and Dominions, prepared himselfe hitherward, and vpon the sixt of Aprill came to Barrwick, thence to Wytherington, Newburgh, Durham, York, Lancaster, Newark, Burleigh, Poistow, Theobalds, and thence to London vpon the seuenth of May. In all which places hee was most royally and ioyously receiued, with all demonstrations of trust loyalty, loue and obedience, which was no lesse benignely accepted of by his Maiefty, who the better to manifest his royal disposition, in all such places as hee came, where Gaieties for offenders were kept, out of his clemency most graciously set free the Prisoners, (those only excepted, who lay for treason, murder, or Romish disloyalty) disbursing also large summes of money for releafe of many others from their creditors.

(6) In all which progresse, admirable was the confluence of people, which with haste to meete him, seemed rather to flie then to runne, and such were their shoutes of ioy, that the hills resounded the Echo thereof, euen vp to the heauens, which had bene so propitious, as to bestow on them so good a King, which most abundantly appeared the day that his Maiefty removed from Theobalds to London, when at Stanford-hill, next vnto Tottenham-Crosse in Middlesex, the City of London (represented in the Lord Maior, the Aldermen, with five hundred choice Citizens, all in chaines of gold, & very well mounted) met his Maiefty, and with all solemne obsequies attended Him vnto the Charter-house neere Smithfield, which was most sumptuously furnished for his royal entertainment. On which very day, a Proclamation came forth against all griping Monopolies that hindered commerce, and Protections that stopped the due proceedings of law, as also against other abuses in other inferior carriages. All which were so acceptable to the People and Common-wealth (which had bene too much eaten-out with such Locusts & Caterpillars) as neuer any King wanne himselfe more loue: these being accepted as the auspicious beginnings, promising most happy sequels. So that his entrance was as another Constantine, whose person euery man prayed for, and desired to see: and for Peace another Ottavianus, hauing ruled peaceably a fourtithring Nation, euen from his younger yeeres, and lued in peace with all the Princes and Kings of the earth: in which peace now lastly hee brought the Crown and Kingdome of Scotland to augment the glory, circuit and strength of this Realme of England, in whose vnitied body, as a faire branched tree, euen at the first hee beganne to engraft the Syences of his princely vertues, which by the sappe and Sunne-shine of his iust gouernement still spredde more and more, like vnto the Cedars that grow vpon Lebanon.

(7) The English Empire thus peaceably established, both by and vnto, this peaceable Monarch: from sundry forraigne Princes were sent Ambassadors, to congratulate his entrance; as namely, from the Pals-graue of the Rhine, one of the Princes Electors for the Emperour of the Romans: from the French King, Monsieur de Roissy, Great Treasurer of France: from the Spanish King, Don Iohn de Tassit: from the States of Holland and Zealand: from the Archduke of Austria: from the Seigniorie of Venice: from the Duke of Florence, and from others.

(8) But among all new-commers, none was more admired nor gazed on, then was Hugh Oneal, Earle of Tir-om, that perfidious, (but very valiant) subtle subtle, and smooth-tongued Traitor, and Boutefeu of Ireland, that had bene the death of many a worthy man; who hauing (as wee haue shewed) yielded himselfe to the Lord Generall Montjoy in the sicknesse of the late Queene, was now by him brought vnto Englands Court, to the Generals great honour, and *Tyrone*s great good, if hee could haue had grace to containe himselfe. For not onely was he taken vpon his lowly submission into fauour with his dread Soueraigne, and restored to his former estate and dignity, (a very great fauour to so great an offender) but a Proclamation was also made in his behalfe, and for his security, that hee should of all men bee honourably vsed (a grace, seldom shewed a Traitor) because as it seemed, his guilty conscience lurcharged with bloud, feared the hand of euery man that beheld his face; and indeed many a woman, enraged for losse of their husbands or sonnes, furiously desired and assayed to quench their hatred with his bloud: in which perplexity wee will leaue him for a restlesse Rebel, who lastly like a fugitiue left againe both his loyalty and his owne Country.

(9) In the meane while the solemnities for the Coronation were prepared, and many stately Trophies (no lesse due to the conseruation of Peace, then to the achieuings of Warre) in London streets set vp, which by reason of the great sicknesse in that Citie then cruelly raging, stood a long time rather like the ruines of some old decay, then the Princely Pageants of a new Triumph. For before the appointed day of Coronation (which was the twenty fifth of Iuly being the feast day of Saint James the Apostle) a Proclamation came forth, that no Londoner should presume to approach to the Court, the City hauing buried that weeke about a thousand of the plague. But yet a greater plague to the Land then this, was intended some weekes before, had not the prouidence of a good God preuented the designs of mercilesse men. For, certaine Italian Priest, boyling in reuengfull rancor, because their plots and hopes (which they vainly promised themselves for aduancement of their Religion) were now past all appearance of possibility or successe, and combining with some other of better Rank and Note, whom priuate discontent had whetted on to a publike mischief; contriued together a desperate designe, for surprize of the Kings Person and Prince Henry his sonne. Of forces to effect it, they made no doubt, meaning to retaine them prisoners in the Tower, and with the Treasures therein to maintaine their intent, or, if the Tower were impugnable, then to carry them to Douer Castle, and there by violence either to obtaine their owne pardons, a toleration in Religion, and a remouall of some Counsellors of the State, or else to put some further proiect in execution. To conceal this Treason, Watson the Priest deuised Oaths for secrecy, and himselfe with Clarke (another Priest also) taught, that the act was lawfull, being done before the Coronation, for that the King was no King, before he was anointed, and the Crowne solemnly set on his head.

(10) The other persons whose loyalty was likewise called into question, as inuolued in the attempt, were Henry Brooke, Lord Cobham and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Walter Raughley Lord Warden of the Stanerries, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parham knights, George Brooke, and Bartholomew Brooksby Esquires, and Anthony Copley a Gentleman; all which parties being apprehended, were committed some to the Gatehouse at Westminster, others to the Tower of London. Meane while (notwithstanding the raging sicknesse) the day for the Coronation (being the feast of Saint James) was celebriously kept with all solemne performance and ancient Rites of the English Kings, in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter in Westminster. Where, the antique Regall Chaire of inthronization, did blessedly receiue, with the person of his Maiefty, the full accomplishment also of that Propheticall prediction of this Itu comming to the Crowne, which Antiquity hath recorded to haue bene therein inscribed thus,

Ni fallat Fatum Scoti hunc quocunq; locatum Inuenient Lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem;

*If Fates goe right, this Stone, where e're 'tis pight,
The Scot shall find, and there his Raigne be signd.*

For euen there now the sacred Oile was powred vpon the royal Persons of King James and Queene Anne, by the most reuerend Prelate, Iohn Whitgift Lord Arch-Bishoppe of Canterbury, the Prince and Peeres wearing their Robes and Coronets, the Officers giuing attendance in their places, and the Lord Maior of London in a Gowne of Crimson Veluet, with the Aldermen in Scarlet: twelue principall Citizens were admitted to attend them, all other forbidden because of the plague.

(11) As the great multitude of the City of London by reason of this infection, and the retirednesse both of his Maiefty and all his Nobles, gaue some hopes to the fore-mentioned Priests and their Abettors, for the easier accomplishing their plots: so was it also some occasion of the delay of Iustice on them after their treasonous designs were now fully brought to light. Wherefore, London continuing still vnfit for such a triall, and requisite concourse of Peeres and people, Winchester, the Towne being there kept, was the place designed for their arraignment, whither they were all conueyed vnder strong guard. The first who there came to their triall, were George Brooke, brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parham, Brooksby, Copley, Watson, and Clarke; whose inditement was, that they had conspired, first, to destroy the King, secondly, to raise Rebellion; thirdly, to alter Religion; fourthly, to subuert the State; and lastly, to procure foraine Inuasion. That these their intents they had made knowne vnto the Lord Gray, whom they meant should haue bene Earle Marshall of England, Watson Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treasurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary. That with the King, the Lords also should be surprized in their chambers at Greenwich, and the Lord Maior and Aldermen of London should bee sent for, and so be shut vp in the Tower.

(12) George Brooke hereunto answered (with a colour and pretext as leude as the attempt,) that he had Commission from the King to doe what hee did, onely to try faithfull Subjects; which commission hee could not produce. Sir Griffin Markham (excepting onely the imputation of bloud) confessed his offence very penitently, alleging it was through a discontented mind, and desired the Lords to be a meane to the King for mercy. Watson and Clark (the former of which confessed he had drawn all those Gentlemen into these plots) did vainly and ignorantly auerre, that they held the King no King, vntill hee was Crowned, and that therefore it could not be Treason; alleging, that Saul was not King vntill he was chosen in Miseph, though he had bene anointed in Ramah by Sannell the Prophet; neither Ieroboam, who in the daies of Salomon, had bene confirmed by the Prophet to raigne ouer Israel, vntill the people made him King vpon the foote-hill answeres of Rehoboam. Thus these great Rabbis made no difference betwixt the mediate and ordinary succession of lawfull Princes, ordered by God to be his Vice-gerents in fully-established Common-wealths, and those Kings which himselfe extraordinary aduanced, and created to be the whips in his hand; as the first manifestly proved, when they had callt off Sannael, and the latter allowed, when God ther end, as by the Prophet is apparent, where God in him faith, I gaue them a King in mine anger, and I tooke

took him away in my wrath; but the more learned informed them, that in England is no Inter-regnum, because the King neuer dieth, and that the Coronation is but a Ceremony to shew the King to the people.

(13) Two daies after was Sir Walter Raughley brought to the Barre, being indicted for combining with the Lord Cobham (his accuser) in the foresaid designs. Whereunto he pleaded not guilty, and so stood for his purgation, as he held argument from morning till night, to the hearers no little admiration, that a man of so exquisite vnderstanding and experience should give consent vnto such a plot, no lesse foule, then foolish. Yet in fine hee was found guilty, and had sentence of death.

(14) The like iudgement, a few daies after, passed vpon the Lords, Cobham and Gray, arraigned on two feuerall daies. The former being indicted, for combining with Sir Walter Raughley and George Brooke, to procure forces from the King of Spain; and the Arch-Duke, for an Inuasion, &c. The other for ioyning with the foresaid Priests, Knights, and Gentlemen, in their fore-mentioned conspiracies. The Lord Chancellor of England, being Lord Steward for that seruice, fate vnder a Cloth of Estate in the vpper end of the Hall, the Nobles sitting (as their Peeres and Iudges) on benches vpon both sides. Those at the Barre hee willed to bee bold, and to answer without feare: the Kings learned Counsell hee intreated not to confound the memory of the prisoners with vnecessary matters: and the Peeres, though vnworne, hee aduised to try indifferently betwixt the King and the arraigned; who both pleading not guilty, were yet found otherwise by the Court, and receiued iudgement of death.

(15) Of all these arraigned, Sir Edward Parham only was acquitted by the Iury, and of all the rest only three died, which were Watson, Clarke, and Master George Brooke: the former of which, hauing at large laid open in Print, the Treasons and vnflattering machinations of the Iesuiticall Order, left this suspicion on them at his death, that they, in reuenge, had cunningly and covertly drawn him into this Action, which brought him to this shameful end. After whose death, his Maiefty then at Wilton, (hauing commanded his Lords, to deliuer the true narration vnto him of the whole proceeding in the arraignments and answers of all the rest) signed also a warrant for the execution of the Lords Cobham and Gray, as also Markham, to be performed the Friday following before ten of the clock in the morning. Notwithstanding his Maiefty more moued to milde mercy, then the high straine of Iustice, of his Princely and free clemencie, gaue life vnto those persons, expecting present death, and thus with his owne hand wrote to counterchecke his former Warrant.

(16) Although it bee true, that all well gouerned and flourishing Kingdomes and Common wealthis are established by Iustice, and that these two Noblemen by birth, that are now upon the point of execution, are for their treasonable practices condemned by the Law, and adiudged worthy of the execution thereof, to the example and terror of others: The one of thaim hauing filthily practised the overthrow of the whole Kingdom, and the other for the surprize of our owne Personne: yet in regard that this is the first yere of our Reigne in this Kingdom, and that neuer King was so farre oblig'd to his People as we haue bene to this, by our entry here with so hairy and general an applause of all forties. Among quhom all the kinne, freinds, and allies of the saids condemned persons, waite as forward and desirous as any other our good Subiects, as also that as the very time of their Arraignement none did more freely and readily give their assent to their conviction, and to deliuer thaim into the hands of Iustice, then so many of their nextest Kinsmen and Allies (as being Peers) waite vpon their Iuries as likenesse in regard that Iustice hath in some sort gotten course already, by the execution of the two Priests, and

George Brooke, that waite the principall plottes and intais of all the rest, to the embracing of the saids treasonable machinations, we therefore (being resolu'd to mixe Clemency with Iustice) are contented, and by these Presents command you, our present Sheriffe of Hampshire to superseed the Execution of the saids two Noblemen and to take thaim backe to their prison againe, quibulo our further pleasure bee known. And since we will not haue our Lawis to haue respect to persons in spairing the great, and striking the meane sort: It is our pleasure, that the like course be also taken with Markham, being sorry from our hart, that such, not only the heynous nature of the saids condemned persons crime, but even the corruption is so great of their naturall disposition, as the care we haue for the safety and quiet of our State, and good Subiects, will not permit vs to vyle that Clemency towards thaim, quibulo in our owne naturall inclination, we might very easily be perswaded vnto.

(17) This Letter thus framed, the deliuey thereof his Maiefty committed vnto one John Gibb a Scottish Gentleman, a discreet person, and free from dependancy of any Noble man or Counsellor, neither was he of any extraordinary ranke, as well that the by-standers should not obserue any alteration for the execution, as the delinquents themselves take any apprehension by his presence, to the end that each of them feuerally should prepare to breath out their last breath, with a true confession of their secret consciences. The time approaching, Sir Griffin Markham brought to the Scaffold, (to that end erected on the Castle Greene) made himselfe ready for the stroke of the Axe, when secretly Master Gibb deliuey vnto the high Sheriffe of the Shire the Kings Warrant to the contrary, who soone perceiving his Maiesties intent tooke backe the prisoner, (as if he were first to confront the two Lords in the Hall vpon some seruice to the King,) from the Scaffold, and brought him into the Castle Hall. Then was the Lord Gray brought forth, who hauing powred out his praies vnto God, at length kneeling downe for the stroke of death, the Sheriffe bad stay, telling the Lord that some further seruice was expected of him, and thereupon likewise lead him againe into the Castle. The Lord Cobham then was brought to the Scaffold, who being in praies and preparation for death, the Lord Gray and Sir Griffin were brought backe againe, where the prisoners all three appearing together on the Scaffold, the Sheriffe notified his Maiesties Warrant for the stay of their Executions, and that as then they should not dy. Vpon which rare Clemency, vnexpected both of prisoners and spectators, arose such shouts of the people, as was wonderful, crying God saue the King, and the condemned overcome with his Clemency, willed they might sacrifice their liues to redeeme their own faults and to repurchase so mercifull a Princes loue.

(18) This businesse thus transacted, for the safety of the Kings Person and whole Kingdom; his Maiefty, (who well considered, that the quiet of a Weale-Publike cannot possible subsist long, without the peace and well managed gouernment of the Church,) hauing among many other Petitions which were presented to him at his first entrance, receiued one from certain persons of vnquiet spirits, against the established Gouernment and Liturgy in the English Church, resolu'd now by his Princely iudgement, as another Hezekiah to breake the Brazen Serpent, if Idolatry were thereunto committed, and like a second Iosiah, to reade the law of the Lord him selfe: whereupon by Proclamation hee commanded an assembly of select Diuines, such as could best deliuer the minds of both parts, to appeare in his Royall presence, at his Mannor of Hampton Court: whither the summoned accordingly repayed. For the maintained Church-state, were the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Worcester, Saint Davids, Chichester, Carlisle and Peterborough: the Deanes of the Chappel,

On Thursday

The persons summoned.

Christ Church, Worcester, Westminster, Pauls, Chester, and Windsor, with Doctor Field, & Doctor King, the now Lord Bishoppe of London. To deliuer the Plaintiffs desires, were summoned, and appeared Doctor Reynolds and Doctor Sparkes of Oxford, M. Knewstun, and M. Chaderton of Cambridge.

(19) The first sitting was vpon Saturday, the fourteenth of Ianuary, in his Maiesties Priuy-chamber at Hampton Court, wherinto the Church-Gouernours only being admitted (by his Maiesties command) in the presence of his Priuy Counsell, he made a most godly and princely declaration of his intent, in summoning this Assembly, in effect, thus; That "this proceeding was no nouell deuise, but according to the example of all Christian Princes, who in the commencement of their reignes, vntill they take the first course for the establishing of the Church both for doctrine and policy, to which the very Heathen themselves had relation in this their Prouerbe à loue Principum. And particularly in this land, King Henry the eight, towards the end of his reigne; after him King Edward the sixth, who altered more; after him Queene Mary, who reuered all and the last Queen of famous memory, who serled the Church state as now it standeth. Wherein yet his Maiefty deemed himselfe happier then they, in that they were faine to alter those things which they found established, whereas as himselfe saw yet no cause, so much to change any thing, as to confirme that which he found so well settled already. Which State he affected his Royall heart, that it pleased him, both to enter into a gratulation to almighty God, (at which words he put off his hat) for bringing him into the land of Promise, where Religion was purely professed, where he fate among graue, learned, and reuerend Diuines, who better knew what belonged to the State of a King, to the honor and order of a kingdom, then some other Nations did, and withall to assure the Prelacy there present, that hee intended not any Inuouation, acknowledging the Government Ecclesiasticall to haue bene approued by manifold blessings from God himselfe, both for the encrease of the Gospell, and with a most happy and glorious peace. Yet, because nothing could be so absolutely ordered, but that somewhat might be added, and in any State as in the body of man, Corruptions like ill humors might insensibly grow either through time or persons; his purpose was, after the example of a good Philitian, to make search into the supposed diseases, and to examine the complaints, so to remoue the occasions thereof, if they were scandalous, or to cure them, if they were dangerous, or if but friuolous, yet to take knowledge of them, thereby at once both to cast a stoppe into the mouth of Cerberus, and of all factious spirits, and withall to giue satisfaction to all quiet and sober minded men.

(20) His Maiefty concluding this his general advertisement, entered more particular discourse with the Bishops (for his owne priuate information) concerning the Booke of Common Prayer, Excommunication in the Ecclesiasticall Courts, and the prouision of fitte and able Ministers for Ireland. Touching matters in the said Booke, hee desired satisfaction; First, for Confirmation, which if it were held and so called, as if the Sacrament of Baptisme were thereby confirmed, & were inualid without it, then was it in his iudgement blasphemous: but if it were only that Children, who at their Baptisme made profession of their faith by the mouthes of others, might before the Bishops profess it in their owne persons, and so receiue Episcopall Benediction by prayer, and imposition of hands, then was it of very sacred use in Gods Church. Secondly, for Absolution, which his Maiefty had heard compared to the Popes pardons. Thirdly, for Private Baptisme, which hee vterly disliked to bee administered, but by a lawful Minister. His second point was Excommunication, wherein hee moued two especiall considerations; the one of the Matter, that the sentence being so weighty, was not to be pronounced vpon euery sleight cause: the other of the Person, why Lay-men as Chancellors & Commisars, and not rather the Deane and Chapter, or other graue Ministers and Chaplaines should be assumed by the Bishops for their assistants therein. The last which was touching a sufficient Minister in Ireland, his Maiefty referred to another day.

(21) But his Maiefty receiued full satisfaction & contentment by the seuerall answers to all his demands. Touching Confirmation, that the Church of England held it no essentiall part of the Sacrament of Baptisme, but a practice of the Primitive Church, yea of the Apostles (as Calvin himselfe expounds their meaning, who also willed the restitution thereof in such Churches where it had bene abolished,) and for imposition of hands on children, warranted by Christ himselfe, a Custome still retained in our Church, as very godly and necessary for those very reasons and vses, which his Maiefty had mentioned, and truly obserued. Touching Absolution, it was answered, that as Christ desired not the death of sinners, so hee hath giuen power and commandment to his Ministers, to pronounce his mercy with remission of sinnes vnto all Penitents, that the practice hereof in the English Church, is so farre from Popery, as that the Reformed Churches of Augusta, Boheme, and Saxony, do both allow it, and retain it, yea, and Calvin himselfe approues it. Of Private Baptisme it was answered, that though the words seemed somewhat doubtful, yet the practice of the English Church did contradict all administration of it by Laikes and Women, in censuring them in that case: whereupon it was concluded, that a lawful Minister only should be employed in times of necessity, when the Infant was in danger of life; yet so vnderstood, that the person was in no wise to be reputed of the Essence of the Sacrament. And finally, for Excommunication, it was there resolu'd, that the abuses (if any such there were) being remoued and amended, that sacred censure should retain its necessary vigour in the Church; and so for that day his Maiefty dismissed the Assembly of his Prelates.

(22) Vpon Monday following, being the sixteenth of Ianuary, those other Doctors, who were to relate the dislikes of the Opposites, were called likewise into the Priuy Chamber, where in presence of his Prelates and Peeres his Maiefty deliuey vnto them, a pithy & princely declaration of his mind, "That he intended not to inuouate the gouernement neuer established, which by long experience hee had found accomplished with so singular blessings of God forty five yeeres, as that no Church vpon the face of the earth hath more flourished then this of England. But rather his meaning, and earnest desire was, first to settle vniormity through the whole, for the more quiet and flourishing estate thereof: secondly, to plant vnto for the suppression of Papists, and enemies of Religion: thirdly, to amend abuses as incident to Bodie politike, as to the shadow to the body Naturall; which once getting entrance, hold on as a Wheele doth his motion, when it is once set on going. Among the complaints therefore of many greuanances made since his entrance into England, none was more weighty, nor himselfe more willing to heare and amend, then such as might concerne the State of the Church, if the same did in any wise decline from the ancient and Apostolical rule. For which cause hee had sent for them, whom hee vnderstood to be graue, learned, & modest Diuines, to heare by them those greuanances, and seuerall objections at large, and desired them boldly to declare the same.

to godly, so learned, so careful a King, reduced all matters, either desired or disliked amongst the weak brethren (whose *Spoke*man hee protested hee would not have been, but only upon his Maieities mandatory Summons) vnto those foure heades. 1. for preferment of true doctrine. 2. for placing of good Pastors, 3. for sincere administration of the church government; 4. for explanation of some clauses in the Common-prayer Booke. It would be here too impertinent, to force an historickall Narration with those Theologicall particulars, which upon those feuerall points were then produced, and are *elsewhere to be found exactly related. Yet as wee cannot but commend the iudgement of these foure Diuines (as touching the third point) in that finding no iust exception to the Epi(copall) Hierarchie of our Church, in no one word they impugned or disapproved the same; so much more mult we celebrate the admirable dexterity, iudgement and learning of his sacred Maieity, ioyned with so rare industry and patience, whose owne accurate search and exquisite expostions of Scriptures, Fathers, and primitive practices, did there both breed wonder & astonishment in that noble and learned audience, and also giue singular satisfaction (euen to the *agents for the Opposites) touching all the exceptions taken to the Church-state; which his Maieity now found to bee no other then the phantasies of a scrupulous indiscretion.

(24) The Wednesday following, being the 18. of January (appointed for the next meeting) his Maieity againe, with most of the Lords of his Priuy Councill, entred the Chamber, where the Reuerend Prelates with such others only as the L. Archbishoppe appointed, (for to his Maieity comanded) being admitted to his Royal presence, after some conference about the High Commission court, Subscription, Oath ex officio and the like, his Maieity (causing the other foure Diuines to be then called in) was pleased to declare what formerly had past; and for a conclusion, shut vp all with a godly exhortation, like another Constantine, perswading every man to vnitie, and to a diligent discharge of their duties, their in feuerall places; the superiors to gouerne without violence, the inferiors to obey without murmuring, and all of them to builde Gods Temple without sound of discord; desiring and commanding all present, not only themselves to labour that way, but to be a meanes to draw on all others vnto a peaceable conformity, the matters being no other (as now hee saw plainly) but of meere weakness: wherein persons discreet would doubtlesse bee easily henceforward reclaimed, and for the undiscreet & reluctant, their roomes were more behouefull then their seruices: by their fruites therefore He should discern and iudge them; Obedience and Humility being the markes of honest and good men, which thenceforth hee would expect from as many as would be held well affected to his Maieity and his State. Which princely exhortation (delivered with much more feeling words, and mouing earnestnes) was so piercing as it fetched teares from some of both sides, and all vnanimously protested their most dutifull obedience to those his Royall commands.

(25) Besides this maine fruit of this famous conference, the settling of the Church-peace, sundry other important matters (not here to be pretermitted, because necessarily tending to that noble end) were therein also projected, and by his Maieities euer prouident care had then their conception, though after-times brought the birthes to perfection. The first (both in due ranke and vie) was his sacred Decree for a new Translation of the holy Scriptures, vpon a princely and pious care of Gods eternall Truth according to the Originals, as also for an vniforme reading thereof in the Churches. To which end three selected Companies from Oxford, Cambridge and in London, most iudicious in the languages and learning being employed, after long conference, much reading, and diligent comparing of all translations with the ancient originals, it is now most exactly and happily published, as a witness to the world both of Gods constant promise, that Heauen and Earth should perish, but his word should neuer; and also of the Religious care of his Vice-gerent, in seeking euen at the first, the first thing that man is commanded to seeke after, whose praise shall stand for euer in the Record of that godly work, and the worke shall iustifie it selfe against all gaine-sayers to Gods eternall glory, and many foules great comfort.

(26) His second sacred proiect was, that as now in England, so also in Ireland, Wales, and the Northerne parts, true Religion (which hee there auowed to bee the only band of true obedience) might be thoroughly planted. Which religious purpose hee so zealously prosecuted, especially for the North and all Scotland, as that he held it not sufficient to haue ioyned these two Kingdomes into one Temporall Monarchy, vnlesse He might see them both vnitd also in the Doctrine, Regiment and Rites of one spiritual Hierarchie. Neither was his princely wisdom for the meanes lesse conspicuous then his zeale in the intendment, in making so heedfull choise of such English Diuines, as were (not long after) in this employment sent into Scotland; the very first, in which Apostolike Ambassage for establishing those Neighbour-Churches was he, whose eminency both for Place and Piety, is now worthily formost in guiding our owne; and whose blessed trauels in that seruice, as they were acceptable to God, his Maieity, and that Nation, so are they a document to others, how powerful & admirably successful true Learning is, where it is guided with true Piety, and where Piety and loue of Gods glory is linked with Charity, and zeale of mans good.

(27) This great business and conference so fully accomplished, his Maieities next care was (herein also as another Constantine) to perpetuate the maintenance of this flourishing Church (whose peaceable estate hee had thus provided for) with the reuencues of her ancient foundations; as also to establish salutary lawes for the peaceable gouernment of his people; to which purpose a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, the 19. of March, wherein, for the Church it was enacted, that neither Archbishoppe nor Bishoppe should alienate, assure, giue, grant, demise, or in any sort conuay, no, nor to the King himselfe, his Heires or Successors, any of the Honors, Castles, Manors, Lands, Tenements or Hereditaments, being parcell of the possessions of his Archbishopricke or Bishopricke; and if any so were, to bee vterly void and of none effect, notwithstanding any former law, statute, act, or ordinance to the contrary.

(28) Foure dayes before this Parliament commenced, it pleased his Maieity, with the most noble Queene Anne, and the most illustrious Prince Henry, attended with glorious troupes of great Peeres, Prelates, and Courtiers, to ride in triumph through the City of London to Westminster, the houses beautified with rich hangings, the streets adorned with goodly Trophies and Pageantes, of feuerall nations inhabiting, the rayles on both sides couered with blew cloth, the feuerall Companies honourably addressed, and ranked vnder the displayed Ensignes and Armes of their feuerall Trades and Sciences; the one shewing the wealth and state of the City; the other, the body of the Citizens and gouernement, and all making manifest the vnspokeable ioy they conceiued to receiue their great Soueraigne into this His City and Imperiall Chamber. In pledge of which their exulting ioy, vnfeigned loue, and vowed fidelity, the Recorder at the Crosse in Cheape, both gratulated his Maieity with a pithy speech in the name of the City, and wishing him a golden raigne, presented his Greatnesse with a cuppe cuppe of gold; delivering another likewise to the Queene, and a third to the Prince, which were all no lesse graciously accepted, then most louingly presented.

(29) Neither lesse was his Maieities desire to retaliate the Citizens and other his Subjects true affections, when recounting the great hindrances of Marchanding and Nauigations of trafficke, by reason of the long continued breach betwixt England and Spain, his royall heart tending his Subjects tranquillitie, endeauoured to salue againe those wounds of discord with the sweet balme of Peace; which was solemnly proclaimed in London, August 19. the sea being made open to Merchants for their free commerce.

(30) Both Domesticke and forraigne affaires thus plausibly composd, as his Maieity was the first, who in this last age of the world held the Scepter of the whole Island in his royall hand, so to vnit the two stiles vnder the name of one entire Empire, and the two Nations into a ioint blessed vnitie; Hee caused himselfe by Proclamation to be entitled King of Great Brittain, according to the ancient name of this Isle before the Saxons Conquest; the restoring of which name againe, many foredooming spirits had anciently prefigured, as now wee see effected. Vnto which Imperiall stile, are rightly annexed the Kingdomes of France and Ireland, rightfully belonging by birth and Conquest vnto the Crowne of England.

(31) Two other Proclamations afterwards came forth; the one for the Banishment of all Iesuites & Seminary Priests, out of the land, and the other to confirme the Ecclesiasticall gouernment, and Booke of Common Prayer, in the same forme and estate, as Queene Elizabeth left them; to the no little griefe of the workers for Rome, whose designs began now to sucke in such poyson, as in the venting whereof, not onely the earth might haue trembled vnder the weight of such monsters, but euen the heauens be astonished and confounded, to giue those Serpents the breath or benefit of aire. Vnto which bloody, horrible and odious act to God and man my Stile must now turne: a matter indeed so distastefull for mee to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres my very soule to fill the penne with inke, or to blotte the paper with these far blacker spots of darknes, and deformers of Englands faire face.

(32) The plotte was to vndermine the Parliament house, and with Gunpowder to blow vp the King, the Prince, Clergy, Nobles, Knights and Burgesses, the very confluence of all the flower of Glory, Piety, Learning, Prudence, Authority in the land; fathers, sonnes, brothers, allies, friends, foes, Papists, and Protestants, all at one blast. A stratageme inuented by him that blowes the bellows of destruction, fashioned in the forge of the bottomlesse pitte, put in practise in a vault of darknesse, and forwarded by him that is the father of darknesse, and in darknesse I could wish it might euer dwell, whose life was neuer reuealed to the light of the Sunne. Their intent, when that religious atchieuement had bene performed, was to surprize the remainder of the Kings Issue, to alter religion and the State, and to bring in forraigne power. Sir Edmund Baynam an attained person (who stiled himselfe Prince of the damned Crew) was sent vnto the Pope, as hee was a temporal Prince, to acquaint him with the Gunpowder-treason; a fitt Poste indeed to bee employed betwixt the Pope and the Diuell.

(33) This treason was first set on foot in the last yeere of the late Queenes raigne, when Henry Garnet the Superiour of the Iesuites, Catesby and others lent Thomas Winter into Spain to negotiate with King Philip in the name of the English Catholikes; first, to send an army vnto them, who now were in a readinesse to ioyne their Forces with his; secondly, to grant some pensions vnto sundry persons deuoted to his seruice in England; and thirdly, to giue aduertisement of the discontents that the young Gentlemen and Souldiers had conceiued vpon the death of Essex, whereby a most fit occasion was then offered to forward the common cause. To prosecute which business, he made for his means father Cresswell the Leiger Iesuite in Spain, Don Pedro France a second Secretary to the State, and the Duke of Lerma, a great Counsellor to the king; all of them being said to haue assured this ill commissioned Ambassador, that the office of his employment would bee very gratefull to their master.

(34) The place for landing concluded vpon by these wise Statists, was Kent or Essex, if the Kings Army were great; if otherwise, then Milford Haven in Wales was held fittest: with these and other like complots, Winter all that summer followed the King in his Progress, and lastly had answer by the Count Miranda, that his King would bestow a hundred thousand Crownes towards the expedition, halfe thereof to bee paid that present yeere, and the rest in the next Spring, when (at the farthest) hee meant to let foot in England; on whose behalfe hee willed the English Catholikes to maintain their promise, whom hee respected (as was auowed) as his owne proper Castilians: And further desired their continuall aduertisements, if in the mean time it chanced the old Queene to die.

(35) Winter thus laden with hopes, returneth from Spain, and emptieth his male into the bosoms of Garnet, Catesby, and Tresham, and they vnto others, all of them tickled to heare the newes, rested fully satisfied, expecting the day. But before the Spring-time was fully approached, that Morning Starre, and Mirror of her Sexe, did set in our West, the thrice glorious Elizabeth, who had now iudged Israell full forty foure yeeres in admirable tranquillity, as in her raigne wee haue sufficiently scene. To signifye whose death Christopher Wright was from Catesby and others sent into Spain, and Guy Fawkes likewise was posted thither from Brussels by Sir William Stanley, both of them to prosecute the former negotiation, assuring the Spanish King, that King James meant to runne the same course, and to proceede as rigorously against the Catholikes, as the late Queene had done: for whose defence they instantly desired that some Spaniards might bee transported vnto Milford-Haven, where the Romish-minded would bee forward to assist them, hauing in a readinesse two thousand horse furnished for the enterprise. But King Philip awell poizing his honour, as his zeale for Religion, and obseruing a great difference betwixt States in hostility, and of Kings raigning in friendship, in no wise would list to inuade England, or further to proceed in any forcible enterprise.

(36) In the meane while the Iesuites had been tampering to disswade the acceptance of King James into England, vrging it for a Maxime, that death was to bee endured, rather then to admit an heretike (so it pleased them to rearme the Lords appointed) and those that gaue him consent they held lyable to Excommunication by the censure of Pope Clement the eight, who had liberally bestowed vpon his sacred person the names of a Puritan, an Heretike, a Caluinist, a Persecutor of Protestants, and another Italian Apostate.

(37) The Romanists thus loosened from their Ankor-hold of Spain, and left by that Pilote to shift for themselves, now perceived their owne error in their long expectation, That change of State would change Religion: but hee now gone, whose life they had often laid for, and her godly Successor no whit inferior to her for aduancing the Gospel: their hopes grew desperate (as these desperates alleadged) and no other meanes now left them but onely to kill the King, whom they falsely calumniated to haue broken his promise for a toleration in Religion.

Religion, as Watson and Percy had diuulged among them: yea, and a fraudulent message was sent to the Pope by the Scottish Secretary, that K. James would become his obedient sonne. But how farre his religious heart was from these aspersions, appeared both by Watson himselfe, who, condemned to die, took it upon the salvation of his soule, that hee could not draw the smallest comfort from the King for a toleration of the Catholics, but that himselfe had imparted his words in a milder tone then his Majesty meant them, only to keepe (as he excused the matter) the Catholics in love and duty unto the King: and since by the Lord of Balmerinoth (Secretary to the King in Scotland) who acknowledging his offence, hath bene arraigned and found guiltie of death, for devising letters, and sending them to Rome, which himselfe cunningly got signed in shuffling them amongst others, his Majesty being vterly ignorant of the Contents.

(38) Upon which false suggestions, the Atheistical position of Catesby was grounded, who helde it for an Axiome as Father Parsons had taught: That the whole Schoole both of Diuines and Lawyers make it a position certain, and to be undoubtedly beleued, That if any Christian prince whatsoever, shall manifestly turne from the Catholicke Religion, and desire or seeke to reclaime other men from the same, he presently falleth from all princely power and dignity, and that also by vertue and power of the Law it selfe both diuine and humane, even before any sentence pronounced against him by the supreme Pastor and Iudge. And that his Subjects of what estate or condition soeuer are freed from all bond of oath of Allegiance which at any time they had made vnto him as to their lawfull Prince. Nay, that they both may and ought (prouided they haue competent strength and force) cast out such a man from bearing rule among Christians, as an Apostata, an Heretike, a Backslider, and Reuolter from our Lord Iesus Christ, and an enemy to his owne State and Common-wealth, lest perhaps hee might infect others, or by his example or command turne them from the faith. Yea, one steppe further elsewhere is stood vpon, that if any Prince shall but fauour or shew countenance to an Heretike, hee presently loseth his Kingdome. And thus they conclude, that for Heretike a Prince is to be deposed, and his Kingdome to be beleued at the pleasure of the Pope, for whom the People vpon paine of damnation are to take part and fight: out of which detestable conclusions arose the first imoake of the Gunpowder Treason.

(39) For the Parliament dissolved the seuenth of July, and proroged vntill the seuenth of February following, Catesby being at Lambeth, sent for Thomas Winters, who before had bene employed into Spaine, and brake with him then for blowing vp of the Parliament house: who readily apprehending it, said, that indeede strake at the roote: onely these helpes were wanting, a house for residence, and a man of skill to carry the Mine; but the first Catesby assured him was easily to be got, and for the man hee commended Guy Fawkes, a sufficient souldier, and a most forward Catholicke. But first (quoth hee) because no peaceable way shall be intruded, you shall ouer to the Constable, and entreate him to sollicite his Majesty at his coming into England, that the penall lawes may here be repealed, and the Catholics tolerated and ranked with his other Subjects.

(40) Winters thus posted to negotiate with the Constable, found him at Bergen neere Dunkirke, and by the meanes of Owen the fugitiue Traitor, deliuered his message; whose answer was, that he had a strict command from his Majesty to doe all good offices for the Catholics, and for his owne part hee found himselfe bound in conscience not to omit any good occasion that might forward their cause: although indeed hee did but temporize as Sir William Stanley told Winters, for the great desire which the Spaniards had that the Peace might proceed with England. Where upon Winters (hopelesse that way) returned for England, bringing with him the foresaid Fawkes, a fitt instrument for to diuulge a designe; and coming to Lambeth, told Catesby that the Constable was not the man whatsoever were his words, and that all now in these parts were bent for a conclusion of Peace; which founded so harshly in his ill-tuned cares, that his braines became more buified about his impious Project, and his mind in continuall trauell to bring forth that sinne, which hee had most vnaturally conceiued.

(41) Robert Catesby, John Wright, Thomas Winters, and Guy Fawkes holding a community in their mischiefs still about London; about the middle of Easter-Term, Thomas Percy as hote as the Hottspur himselfe to forward Rebellion, came puffing to Catesbies lodging in Lambeth, and the first word hee spake was this: What Gentlemen shall wee alwayes be talking, and neither doe any thing? you perceiue (I know) how things doe proceed. To whom Catesby answered, that something was resolved upon, but first an Oath for seuerall was to be ministered. For which purpose they appointed to meet some three daies after behind S. Clements Church without Temple-barre, where being met, and falling in Conference, Catesby alleged that this last Parliament had left the Catholics in as much danger as they stood before, & that now the peace with Spaine was rather a meane for harder lawes to proceed, then those in force against them to be abrogated; so that the ancient Romish Religion, & the Catholicke professors thereof must now be enforced to bid England adue, if Gentlemen of power and repute should thus giue way to the contrary proceedings, or thus make nice how to helpe, or where to beginne: at which speech Percy made present answer, himselfe was the man that would undergoe the Catholicke cause, were it with the slaughter of the King, which hee was there ready to undertake and doe.

(42) No Tom (said Catesby) thou shalt not aduenture thy selfe to so final purpose, if thou wilt bee a Traitor, there is a plot to greater aduantage, and such a one as can neuer be discovered: and thereupon all of them taking the Oath of seuerall, hearing the Masse and receiving the Sacrament, Catesby told them his diuulish deuise, which was by Mine and Gunpowder to blow vp the Parliament house, and at one stroke with the destruction of many, effect that at once, which had bene many yeeres in attempting. A matter easily performed (as he vrged) if men of resolution would thereunto bestow their purse and their paines; and mo st sure from suspicion of discovery, the designe being so estranged from the conceit of man: wherein he also obserued that religious Justice was thirity of reuenge, even vpon the same persons, and in the same place, whence the first received the vnjust lawes enacted against her. For case of conscience to kill the Innocent with the no-cent, hee told them it was warrantable by the authority of himselfe, the Superior of the English Iesuites, and of Gerrard, and Tesmond (Iesuiticall Priests likewise) who by their Apostolicall power did absolute and commend the fact, which for the aduantage of the Catholics was to be executed (they said) though with the death of some Innocents, rather then the seruice should quail, the necessity of time and occasion for requiring it. The Oath was giuen them by the said Gerrard (the Duels Attorney in this business) the forme whereof was as followeth.

You shall sweare by the blessed Trinitie, and by the Sacrament you now purpose to receiue, neuer to disclose directly nor indirectly, by word or circumstance, the matter that shall be propoed to you to keepe secret, nor desist from the execution thereof, vntill the rest shall giue you leave.

These did Percie hire for his lodgings, entertaining Fawkes (as most vnknowne by face) for his man, who changing his name into Johson, had the Keyes and keeping of the rooms. Neither was this enough, but a house must be also had to supply Percies lodgings for prouision of Powder, & to frame and fit wood for the carriage of the Mine, which Catesby provided at Lambeth, & sware his man Keyes into their Conspiracies, making him the Keeper of those his prouisions, who in the night as occasion serued, conuaid the same vnto the custody of Fawkes.

(44) The appointed day for the Parliament being the 7 of February, in October before it was thought fite to beginne the worke, whereupon Fawkes returning forth of the Country, found Percies rooms appointed for the Scottish Lords to meet in, there to conferre touching the Vnion of the two Kingdoms: so that they feared (for that present) to initiate their attempt. But that honourable assembly dissolved, vpon the eleuenth of December late in the night, they entered into their Workes of Darkenes, and begun their Mine; hauing tooles prepared, and baked meates provided, the better to auoid suspicion by sending abroad.

(45) The Moles that first vnderwent these vnder-minings, were Robert Catesby Esquier, the morning Arch-traitor, and ruine of his name, Thomas Percy Esquier, kinsman and attendant vpon the Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Winters, John Wright and Guy Fawkes Gentlemen, all of them grounded scholars of the Romish Schoole, and such earnest labourers in this their Vault of Villany, that by Christmas Eue (which very day might haue remembered them of more Christian workes) they had brought the worke vnder an entry, vnto the wall of the Parliament-house, vnderpropping still as they went the earth with their framed Timber, nor till that day were they fene abroad of any man.

(46) During this vndermining, much consultation was had how to fashion the rest of the business, after the deed should be accomplished, and many questions propounded and argued at full, before they could pitch on a fited resolution. The first was how to surprize the next heire to the Crowne; for though they doubted not, but Prince Henry would accompany his Father, & take his lot with him, yet they feared lest D. Charles (being absent, as too yong to attend at Parliament) would escape their train, and perchance be so carefully guarded, and attended vpon at Court, that hee would hardly be gotten into their hands. Of which first rub in their way, Percie offered himselfe to be the first remouer, and shewed his meanes, which was, with some other Gentlemen, hee would enter the Dukes Chamber, which by reason of his acquaintance hee very well might doe without any suspicion: and others of his like acquaintance should be placed at several dores in the Court: so that when the blow was giuen, and all men in a maze, then would hee carry away the Duke, which hee presumed would be easily done, the most of the Court being then absent, and the present altogether vnprovided for to make resistance.

(47) For the surprize of the Lady Elizabeth, it was held a matter of farre lesse difficulty, she remaining at the Lord Harringtons, and Albhy (Catesbies house) near vnto her, whether vnder a shew of Hunting, diuers Catholics should be gathered, who hauing the aduantage in knowing for what purpose they were assembled, had the full liberty of that distracted time, to prouide money, horses, armour and other abillments of war, vnder pretence of strength to guard and secure the heire apparant.

(48) Then it was discussed, what Lords they should saue from the Parliament; where it was agreed, that they should keepe thence as many as they could that were Catholics, or that way fauouring: all others to feele the snare, and the imputation of the Treason to be cast vpon the Puritanes, to make them more odious to the world.

(49) Next it was controuersed what forraigne princes should be made priuy to these their purposes; for to enioyne them to iecrefie, or to oblige them by oath, was not in their power: & to assaye their likes or dislikes, would proude the snare. For if any of them approved the design, their preparation might beget suspicion: if not then the feares of discouery would extinguish the enterprize, no man daring to proceed further therein. Spaine was held the fittest to second their attempts, but hee was too slow in his preparations, & France too neere and too dangerous to be dealt with, and how Holland stood affected to England they all very well knew. But in the midst of these turmoiles and minings vnder-ground, the Parliament was againe adiourned till the fift of October ensuing. Vpon which Proclamation they brake off both discouery and worke till the feast of Saint Maries Purification. At which time they laide in powder and other prouisions, and then beganne againe to worke, hauing taken into their company Christopher Wright and Robert Winters, both of them sworne, and receiuing the Sacrament for seuerall. The wall (which was very hard, & nine foot thicke) with great labour they wrought halfe through, Fawkes being their Centinell to giue warning when any came neere, that the noise in digging might not be heard.

(50) The labourers thus working into the wall, were suddenly surprized with a great feare, and casting from them their digging tooles, tooke to their weapons, hauing sufficient of shot and powder in the house, being fully resolved, rather to die in the place, then to yeeld or be taken. The cause of their feare was a noise they heard in a roome vnder the Parliament house, vnder which they meant to haue mined, directly vnder the Chaire of Estate. But al now at a stand, & their countenance cast each vpon other, as doubtfull what would bee the issue of this their enterprize: Fawkes scowled forth to discriy (if hee could) what was done abroad, and finding all safe and free from suspect, returned and told them, the noise was onely a remouall of coales there now vpon sale, and that the Cellar was to be ler, which would be more commodious to their purpose, and would also spare the labour in the Mine. Whereupon Thomas Percy vnder pretence for stowage of his winter prouision of wood and coales, went and hired the Cellar, which done, a new conference was had.

(51) Wherein Catesby found the weight of the whole too heauy for himselfe alone to support; for besides the maintenance of so many persons, and the seuerall houses for seuerall vses, hired and payde for by him, the Gunpowder and other prouisions would rise to a very great summe, and indeede too much for one mans purse. Therefore he desired that himselfe, Percy, and some one more might call in such others as they thought fit to helpe to maintain the charge, alleging that they knew men of worth and wealth, that would willingly assist, but were not willing their names should be known to the rest. This his request they approved as necessary, and withall surceasing further to digge in the Vault, knowing the Cellar would be of better vse for their designs, they remoued twenty Barrels of Gunpowder into that roome, which they couered with a thousand of Billers, and five hundred of faggots, so that now the lodging roomes were cleared of all suspicious prouisions, and freely might be entered without danger of discry.

rogued vntil the fift of Nouember following, these forsaide vnderminers of our State and happinesse thought fite they should againe (for a while) disperse themselves (matters being already in so good forwardnes) and that Guy Fawkes should go ouer to acquaint Sir Willm Stanley, & M. Hugh Owen with these their proceedings, yet so as the oath of secrecie should be taken of them. For their policy was to haue Sir *William Stanley*es preference so loone as the diuinal blow should bee giuen, to bee a leader to their intended stratagems, whereof (as they thought) they should haue great need, & that Owen should remain where hee was, to hold correspondence with forraign Princes, to allay (as much as hee might) the odiousnes of the fact, or to impute the Treason to the Puritanes discontents.

(53) Fawkes comming into Flanders found Owen, vnto whom, after the oath, hee declared the plote, which hee very well approued. But Sir William Stanley (at that time in Spain) Owen said would be hardly drawne into the businesse, for that hee had suites in the English Court himselfe, yet hee promised to forward him in all that hee could, and to send him into England with the first, when their proiect had taken effect. Whereupon Fawkes to auoid further suspition, kept stil in Flanders vntill the beginning of September, and then returning, receiued the keyes of the Cellar, and laid in more powder, billes and fagots; which done, hee retired into the Country, and there kept till the end of October.

(54) In the meane while Catesby and Percy meeting at the Bathe, it was there concluded, because their number were but few, that Catesby himselfe should haue power to call in whome hee would to aide their designe: by which authority hee tooke in Sir Euerard Digby of Ruslandshire knight, and Francis Tresham of Northamptonshire Esquier, both of them of sufficient estate and wealth, had they not abused both to their owne destruction: for Sir Euerard offered fiftene hundred pounds to forward the action, and Tresham two thousand. But Percy disdaining that any should outrun him in euill, promised foure thousand pounds out of the Earle of *Northumberland*s rents, and tenne horse of speed to speed them when the blow was past. Against which time to provide munition, Catesby likewise tooke in Ambrose Rookwood and John Grant two Recusant Gentlemen, and vnderdoubtly others were written in the same Roll, had these two grand Electors bene apprehended alieue, whose owne tongues only could vnfold their Catalogues Record.

(55) The businesse thus forwarded by their complices abroad, their Innates did not neglect the supplies at home. For Percy, Winter and Fawkes had stored the Cellar with thirty fixe Barrels of Gunpowder, and vpon them belowered (in stead of thort) Barres of Iron, logges of timber, massie stones, Iron Crowes, Pickes-axes, and all their working tooles, and (to couer all) great store of Billes and fagots, so that nothing was wanting but fall in a readinesse attending that great and terrible day. Neither were the Iesuiticall Priests slacke on their parts, who vually concluded their Masses and oblatory Sacrifices, with their prayers for the good successe of their expected hopes, as by these verses, made and vsed by Garnet is to be seene.

Vt Christo laudes debitas persoluamus alacriter.*

And others thus, Prosper Lord their paines that labour in thy cause day and night, let Heresie vanish away like smoake, let their memory perish with a cracke, like the ruine and fall of a broken house: Allusions doublelesse to the labours in the Vault, the mounting smoake of powder, and the fall of the Parliament house, which if it had hapned, they might haue said to haue bin Prophetically foretold by their high Priests for that yeere.

(56) But the Lord that neuer slippeth the deliuerance of his elect, kept this his Israel as the Apple of his own eye, & this pit digged for the destruction of others, they fell into themselves: so that we may well say, if the Lord had not bin on our sides when we rose up against vs, they had swallowed vs up quicke, when their wrath was kindled against vs, but praised bee the Lord which hath not giuen vs a pray vnto their teeth: so we are escaped euen as a bird out of the snare of the fowler, the snare is broken, and wee are deliuered. For this Cockatrice egge hatched by themselves proued a Serpent onely to themselves, and themselves (by Gods hand) made the onely Instruments to breake the shell of their owne treason.

(57) For vpon Thursday in the euening, tenne dayes before the intended Parliament, a letter directed to the Lord Monteagle was deliuered by an vnknowne person vnto his footman in the streete, with a straight charge giuen, to giue it into his Lords owne hand, which accordingly hee did. The letter was without date and subscription, and somewhat vnlegible, so as the Nobleman called for one of his seruants to assist him therein, the strange contents whereof much perplexed the true construction, as whether writ by some pasquill to scarr him from attendance, or as matter of consequence from aduise of some friend. Howsoeuer, though it were supper time, and the night as darke as the purport of the letters yet to discharge his loyall duty, hee forthwith repaired to the Kings Palace at Whitehall, where he imparted the letter to the Earle of Salisbury, Principall Secretary, and they both presently acquainted the L. Chamberlaine therewith, who deemed the matter not a little to concern himselfe, the charge of his office being to ouersee all places whether his Maiesty was to repaie, these two Counsellors shewed the same letter to the Earles of Worcester and Northampton, who together concluded (how sleight soeuer the contents seemed to appeare, as proceeding from some fumes of an idle and light braine) to acquaint the King himselfe with the same, which accordingly was done, and was as followeth.

My Lord, out of the loue I beare to some of your friends, I haue a care of your preservation. Therefore I would aduise you, as you tender your life, to deuise some excuse to shifte off your attendance at this Parliament. For God and man haue concurred to punish the wickednesse of this time. And thinke not sleightly of this advertisement, but retire your selfe into your Country, where you may expect the euent in safety. For though there bee no appearance of any stirre, yet I say they shall receiue a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsell is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme, for the danger is past so loone as you haue burnt the letter. And I hope God will giue you the grace to make good use of it: to whose holy protection I commend you.

(58) His Maiesty a while pausing, & then re-reading the letter, deliuered his iudgement, that the stile thereof was too quicke and pythy to bee a libell bred from the superfluities of an idle braine, and on the instant did apprehend by these words; that they should receiue a terrible blow at this Parliament, & yet should not see who hurts them, that a sodaine danger by blast of Gunpowder should be intended by some base villaine in a corner, no insurrection, rebellion, or desperate attempt appearing. And therefore wished, that the vnder rooms of the Parliament house might bee thoroughly searched, before himselfe, or Percies should sit therein. To which purpose it was then concluded, that the L. Chamberlaine should (according to his office and place) view all the rooms about and below: but aswell to stay idle rumors, as to let things ripen to reueale their own mysteries, this his search should bee deferred vntill Monday, the day immediately before the Parliament, & then to bee with a seeming slight eye, to auoid suspition.

(59) The Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine, according to the conclusion, vpon Monday in the after afternoone (being accompanied with the L. Monteagle, who fill thirsted to see the issue) repaired vnto those vnder-rooms, and finding the Sellar so sufficiently stored with wood and coales, demanded of Fawkes (the counterfeite Iohnson, who stood there attending as a seruant of small repute) who owed the place; his answer was, that the lodgings belonged to M. Thomas Percy, and the Sellar likewise, to lay in his winter prouision, himselfe being the Keeper and M. Percies seruant. Whereunto the Earle as void of any other suspition, presently replied, that his Master was well prouided against Winters blasts: but being come forth, the Lord Monteagle told him, that hee did much suspect Percy to bee the inditer of the letter, knowing his affection in religion, and the friendship betwixt them professed, so as his heart gaue him (hee said) when hee heard Percy named, that his hand was in the act.

(60) The Lord Chamberlaine returning, related to the King in presence of some Counsellors, what hee had seene, and the suspition that the Lord Monteagle had of Percy, and himselfe of Iohnson his man; which presently encreased his Maiesties apprehension and ialousie, whereupon hee insisted, that a narrow search should be made, and those billes and coales should be turned to the bottome, which as he confidently supposed was the couering of some notable intended treason. But some moued the doubt how this search should be made: for albeit no caution could be too much in so great a danger, yet the inducement thereunto, being no more then a namelesse inscript, shuffed no man knew whence, and might wel be the euaporation of an idle brain, would seeme (if nothing were found) some scandall vnto the State, to bee ouer suspitious of so friuolous a toy, and which might leaue some bad imputation on a great counsellor of the land. Notwithstanding, his Maiesty still persisting in his former opinion, willed that the search should be thoroughly made, and no possibility of danger left vnexamined, vntlesse they meant to goe to the Parliament, and leaue the hazard to the euent, which hee thought they in conscience were loth to doe. Whereupon it was concluded, that the search should be made; but vnder color of searching for certaine hangings belonging to the house which were missing, and conuaued away.

(61) Sir Thomas Knevet, (now Lord Knevet, then a Gentleman of his Maiesties Priuy-Chamber) was employed herein, and about midnight (before the very morning when the Parliament was to beginne) went vnto the place with a small but well affected company. At the dore of entrance into the Cellar, finding one (which was Guy Fawkes) at so vnseasonable a time, cloaked and booted, hee thought fite to apprehend him, and entering the place, ouerturned the billes and coales, when presently hee found the Serpents nest, stored with thirty fixe barrels (small and great) of gunpowder, then searching the villaine that should haue hatched these egges, found about him a darke lantern, three matches and other instruments for blowing vp the powder: who no whit daunted, instantly confessed his guiltines, and was so farre from contrition or repentance, as hee vowed, that had hee been found within the house (as indeed hee was then but immediately come forth from his worke.) hee certainly would haue blowne vp the house with himselfe, and them all: & was so obdurate in his Romish resolution, that being brought before the Lords of the Council, hee lamented nothing so much, as that the deed had not beene done, saying, that the Diuell and not God was the discoverer of the plot.

(62) As desperate were Catesby, Percy, and the rest, who hauing notice that the L. *Monteagle*s letter did giue some ouerture of suspition, yet would they stay to see the successe, and forsooke not London vntill the same day wherein the deed should haue bene done: Catesby, Percy, Rookwood, both the Wrights, and Thomas Winter, posted all into Warwickshire, where Grant and his associates had taken certaine great horses out of a stable, to forward their hoped great day. These meeting at Dunehurth, where Sir Euerard Digby had made a match for a set hunting, not with hounds for the hare (which was only the colour) but with Nimrod for bloud, and surprize of the most vertuous young Princeesse Lady Elizabeth, were told (by the escaped) of their certaine discouery, and presently scarred with report of pursuit, when strucke with terror, not knowing where to make stay, or whither to flie, they desperately beganne an open rebellion, pretending the cause was Religion, and affirming for truth, that all the Catholikes throates were appointed to be cut. And so trouping together, wandred through Warwickshire, the edges of Worcester, and borders of Staffordshire, their seruants and aiders being about fourescore men, & those euer ready to scale away from them, more care was in keeping, then trust reposed either in their faith or defence. Yet thus ranging, and finding no resistance, they rifled the Lord Windfords house of all the Armour, shot, powder, and other warlike prouisions, but the weather rainy, and the waters somewhat high, the powder in carriage took wet, and thereby became more vnseruiceable, God in his iustice so ordering the successe, that the element of water, and accident of fire fought against them, as the stars in their courses did against Sisera.

(63) For their last fort of refuge, being Halbach in Staffordshire (the house of Stephen Littleton) whither Sir Richard Walshe (high Shiriffe of Worcestershire) pursued them, who thinking the fire no greater (though so great enough) then some fray or riot, sent his Trumpet vnto them, commanding to render themselves vnto him his Maiesties [Minister, with promise of his best meanes (if they so did) to allay the offence. But their owne consciences witnessing what the Shiriffe knew not, told them the fault was too weighty to leaue them any hope of fauour: and thereupon returned answer, that hee had neede of greater assistance then of those few numbers that were with him, before hee could be able to command or controll them. So preparing for resistance, they made ready their weapons, and hauing laid two pound of the said powder in a platter to drie in the chimney, one (a Millar) comming to amend the fire, threw in a billet, wherewith a sparke flying out, chanced to fall on the powder, whose sodaine blast was so violent, that (though being of so small a quantity) it blew vp the rooffe of the house, and scorched the bodies and faces of Catesby, Rookwood and Grant, with some others, whose consciences then stricken with the guilt of their sinne, made them see Gods searching iustice in punishing like with like. Thus being deicd with the accident, and now knowing that all was lost, like desperatemen, they there resolved to die together, let open the gate, suffered the Shiriffes followers to rush in among them, and by valour (as they termed it) fought for their owne destruction; for both the Wrights were therein shot downe dead, Ambrose Rookwood, & Thomas Winter were very fore wounded; and lastly, Catesby and Percy resolutely fighting, backe to backe, were both of them slaine with one bullet of musket-shot.

(64) Thus these high aspiring spirits, deccied with the spirit of illusion, vnder opinion of religion, and dreaming of nolesse then destruction of King, Princes and people, with alterations of kingdomes, Church and State, were miserably defeated, not by humane prouidence, but diuine mercy. Some presently slaine in heate of Rebellion, others deadly wounded were taken alieue, the rest either whole or but lightly hurt, were led prisoners to London, and to other places, all the way gazed at, reuiled and detested by the common people, as some strange Monsters of the world, for this their hellish and horrible Treason; and lastly condemned & executed as they most worthily deserued; whose inditments, arraignments and confessions, I refer to be read in the true Relations

(65) In memory of which great deliuerance, the fifth of Nouember (the day appointed for mercilesse destruction) was by authority of the same Parliament enacted to be for euer celebrated with thanksgiving, prayse and prayers vnto our heavenly Preseruer, and to bee kept holy vnto the Lord through our generations, which we wish may bee obserued, with no lesse acknowledgement of Gods infinite mercies to vs-ward, then was among the Iewes, the institution of their Purim, for their deliuerance from the practise of wicked Haman, that so our Temples being thus freed from their prophane idolatry, wee may euer make this day as the feast of our dedication, like to the Maccabees, who in the same moneth did institute theirs, by cleansing Gods Temple of heathenish pollutions. So shall Christ with his spirituall approach beautifie this Church of ours, as with his humane presence in the Temple at Ierusalem he celebrated that Winters feast of theirs: wherein hee taught that himselfe was the true son of God, and the only dore by which all must enter. Through which therefore let vs with Ieremy approach his Altar to make supplications for the Kings peace: and with Baruch to pray for the Kings life, and life of his sonne, that their dayes may be vpon the earth as the

For my part, I haue here onely pointed at His Maiesties first entrance and acts, rather to shew a liberty of writing the kingdomes affaires, which neuer is permitted, sauing vnder good Princes, then by my vnable performance to enter into that which requires the pen of some iudicious Tacitus, or eloquent Xenophon, and conclude with the aduise of Ammianus Marcellinus the famous Historian: Let other men for experience more sufficient, and for learning better knowne write the rest, whom, if it shall please them to enter thereupon, I aduise to frame their pennes vnto an higher stile.

A summary Conclusion of the vvhole.

By the assistance of the All-Sufficient (the onely defence and Preseruer of man) my insufficient abilities, haue attained the end of this worke, and my weak vnble Person brought to a Period this large Edifice of GREAT BR I-

TAINS THEATRE. How acceptable to others, I know not; but with what paines and traualle to my selfe, my decayed strength too manifestly hath felt, and with what care of truth, the Authorities alleaged through the whole Proesse, are my witness; whose lines haue bene the measures, and Antiquities the matter, that hath railed the Fabrick vnto this height. The attempt was great, and farre vnfit (I must confesse) for me to vndergoe; which, euen at the first entrance was so censured by the Iudicious, and in the continuance hath so proued: that now it being finished, as the Silkworme endeth her life in her long wrought clew, so I in this Theatre haue built my owne Graue; whose Architecture howsoever defectiue it may be said to be, yet the proiect is good: and the cost great, though my selfe haue freely bestowed this paines to the Presse, without pressing a penny from any mans purse. For me to shew the vtilitie of History, were to light a dimme candle before the bright Sunne; or to prescribe a methode for their vices, were, with Phormio to read a Lecture of Cheualrie vnto great Hannibal, warres experienced Conductor: But, as our owne concer-neth vs neere (wherein my pen hath taken the freest access) so let me abridge the whole in a small Circle, and incompasse that briefly, which hath bene related in a farre wider circumference.

(2) Our Land, peopled from Iaphet the first sonne of Noah, fell vnto those sonnes of Gomer, who inhabited these parts of Europe, whose issue were most famously knowne by the name of Brittaines. At first, naked, rude, and ignorant of the true God; yet no sooner were frequented with the ciuill Romanes, but that they couered their Cut-painted bodies with Garments; and shortly imitated them euen in their most ciuillized actions; yea, scarcely was Christ taken downe from his Crosse but they became Christians (the greatest glory of any Nation) and among them the Gospell had her first progresse by established authority. Their Government was vnder Kings, and those of as honourable a respect, as were any other in these West-parts of the World, both in training their Subiects vnto due obedience, and ministering of Lawes for the maintainance of estate. Their warres domestike and forraigne were so managed with Politie and valour, as in the one they valiantly defended themselves against their assaults, and in the other speeded the Romanes in most of their Conquests: which cost them lastly their owne subuerfions, when their warriors and virgins were consumed and transported into other parts, whilst their native Land lay exposed to the will of Inuaders.

(3) The glory-thirsting Romanes (from a crew of lawlesse Shepherds now lately become Lords of the World) were the first that set foot, with displayed Ensigne, for the Conquest of Brittain, and the same first assailed by Julius Caesar from the Coasts of Gallia. Which his attempt was to honourable in esteeme of their Emperors, that Claudius (the fifth in succession) holding the Triumph but bafe, that attends vpon authority without action of Price, made choise of Britaine to adorne his triumphant Chariot, that this Island (sted, as was thought, in another World, and but part thereof shewed by Caesar to the Romans) might adde remembrance of name to his forgetfull Person; and to that end, hauing made hither himselfe, stamped his Conquest vpon his Coines thus, DE BRITANN: and vpon his aged knees crept vp the steps of the Capitoll, to giue thanks of victory vnto his gods on the day of his Triumph; which, though for a small part of this Islands subiection, was yet accomplished with more then ordinarie magnificence, and the shewes greater then vially had bene scene, for the Conquests of farre larger and better knowne Kingdomes. And with as great a care was it kept, whilst the Romans kept their owne greatnes. But when their high-mounted Pillar ouerlaid her owne base, and the farre-spread boughes were growne too weighty for the stemme, many hands at once grasped at the Emperiall Crowne, and all of them together tare the Branches from the Body of that faire Tree. By whom also the faire and flourishing Cedars of Britaine were shaken, and left naked both of fruit, and leafe. So that now the glory of the one declined, and the beauty of the other vterly defaced, and neither of them able any longer to support their owne standings, gaue place vnto desiny that would now haue both downe; whereby the Tewell so much desired, and which had bene kept with such care, was now laid at flake to them that could winne it, and Britaine abandoned by the Romans, without further claime, after they had bene Lords thereof the space of five hundred yeres.

(4) The next Actors vpon Britaines faire Stage, were the Saxons, a people of Germany, fierce, bold and irreligious, as, for the most part, the rest of Nations in those daies were. These infesting with Piracies the Coasts of Britaine and Gallia, grew both fearful and famous in profession of military serices. In France they seized vpon the Country of * Baio-casses; in Germany by intrusion they vntreated the Suenians; in Holland and Friesland, they incoached vpon the Batavians, and Cimbria Cherfonesus (now a continent of Denmarke) they made the place of their aboad. From whence they often assailed the Coasts of this Island, euen whilst the Romans held it for theirs, and were often put backe by Stilicho and others, whose praises the Poet Claudian chaunted aloud. But the Romans departed, and Britaine left bare of men, their land wafted by famine, tumultuous vprores, and by bandings of Great-ones who should be greatest; the Scots and Picts (ancient Enemies to their Peace) tooke the aduantage, and continually made bloody incursions into their Land. And albeit a stone-wall was raised athwart the whole Continent, to impeach their inroades; yet that auailed little, their assaults were so great. Wherevpon the Saxons were sent for, and in their first serice freed the Britains from those raging Picts; The Lands defence then they undertooke, and the Inhabitants consented to maintaine the charge; which whilst it was in giuing was thankfully received, but once receiued was vngratefully forgot. And they (like the Rauens of Arabia, who so long as they are full, yeeld a pleasant noise, but being empty make a horrible cry) emptied faster then the Britains could fill, and euer complained they had not enough, till lastly by surprize they got all into their owne clauies. Then decided they among themselves the best of the Land, and droue their Receiuers into the worst and waste mountaines of Wales, euery of their Captaines sharing a part to himselfe, and of one Emperiall Crowne made seauen Diadems to adorne their owne heads; which long were not worne, without intestine warres, each of them struing to enlarge his owne, vpon his next, till God and destiny againe brought all vnto one, euen to great Egbert, who forbade the Islands old Name, and commanded these now vnted Provinces to be called Anglia. Yet no sooner was this accomplished, with assured hopes conceiued, that the Saxons glory should thence forward ascend and spread forth with peace, but that a sauage nation, as fierce as the Scythians, cast their eyes of desire vpon that beautifull Crowne, and presently attempted, but neuer intermitted any bloody cruelties that could forward the same, till they had let it on their owne Helmets; and these Saxons worne out with resistance, gaue place to the Danes, when time had worne out five hundred sixtie three yeres of their Government.

(5) These Danes thus succeeding (though with no better right to enioy) were a stout furiat Nation whose many Piracies both France and Britaigne had many times felt, before they attained the end of this their Goale. For these, multiplying like Bees in the Hue, the land of their owne natiuitie was too little for each to haue a part: vpon which occasion a custome was practised to banish some that the rest might haue roome. These Exiles therefore (chiefely consisting of their youth) fell vpon other Landes with no lesse danger, then the falling of a sword out of the sheath, and greuously wounded whersoeuer they fell; but no where more deadly then in England. Which for two hundred and eightene yeres continuance, they vncessantly assaulted; sometimes harrowing the Country before them, and carrying away great Booties to their Ships: sometimes impouertishing the People, by exacting great summes of money for composition of Peace: sometimes expelling the Inhabitants, and seating themselves in their places: and sometimes sharing the Country with their Kings, and taking vnto themselves none of the worst; but not as other Conquerors to build, sow, and plant, but to lay wast, cast downe, and destroy, sparing neither Erections for ciuill vnto, nor places of Oratory dedicated to diuine. Yet the Garland once gotten by their King Canut, was worne with great glory, and by three of those Danish Kings, Englands Crowne was enioied. The first of them Potent, religious, wife and iust. The second, illegitimate, an vsurper very agill, but idle: And the third a Tyrant, a Taxe-raiser, lasciuious and a glutton, in which excess he at Lambeth he suddenly ended his life, when the Land became cleared of the Danes for oppressions, after they had a long time attempted, and their Kings for five and twenty yeres space worne the royall diademe of this Realme.

(6) These four Nations fulfilling their times by Heauens assignement, in gaining, keeping, and againe loosing, the rich Garland of GREAT BRITAINES government: a fit, inferior to none, made thereunto a double claime; and by a third (more sure then both) which was their conquering sword, got it. These last (which I pray may be last) were the Normans, a people fierce and valorous, whose many Sea-aduentures were so great, in the daies of Charles the Great, as that he wept to see the harmes they would doe to his France, which proued so many that Charles the Bald (his Grand-Child) was forced to part with the Earldome of Chartres vnto Hasting a Norman; Charles the Grosse with the County Newstria, vnto Godfrey their Chieftaine; and Charles the Simple with all the Countreys which lay betwixt the Riuier Seine and Loyre, vnto Rollo their Leader, whereof he became Duke, and that Dutchie from him named Normandy. Whence William the Bastard the seventh in descent, in a bloodie field at Batell in Sussex, was the English Crowne from King Harald that held it: when, by changing of Lawes, disheriting of Nobles, and bestowing the Lands Reuenues vpon his, he laid the foundation of a glorious Monarchie. At first, somewhat bloodie, (as Conquests commonly proue) and the Crowne

Crowne banded for, among brethren and kindred (as what will not the desire of a Diademe doe?) the two younger brethren successively wearing it, to the prejudice of their * Elder, and Stephen hauing no right, but such as Intruders pretend. But Henrie Plantagenet placed on the Throne, and three hundred thirty one yeres taken vp in the Reignes of foureteene Kings of his line, their Acts afforde matter of more Princely consequence, their Dominions spread wider, themselves being the lawfull Inheritors to the third part of France, and to the Whole by the Title of their third Edward, and by the Conquest of their fifth Henry. And surely had not the ciuill dissensions of Lancaster and Torke spent their weapons in the woundes of themselves, those Kings and their Successors vndoubtedly had bene double crowned euen to this day. But these Rafes plucked off by diffident hands, and their Branches torne downe in home-bred broyles, their roiall rootes lay as it were dead in the Earth, till Tender of Lancaster with Plantagenet of Torke gaue them vigor and sappe, by binding both together in wedlocke; goulden band. Whereby also the long dead Remme of the ancient British Kings beganne againe to bud forth, and fue renowned Princes of that Sirname succeeded in Englands Throne. The first of them, the richest, and wisest King of this Westerne World; The second, the forest wonder of the Papall authority; The third, the forwardest in all pious actions. The fourth the feruentest for the Religion of Rome; And the fifth a Mayden-Queen, the most famously renowned among the Worlds Monarks, vnder whose reignes one hundred and sixteen yeres were fully complete and run. And were it not that the English are taxed to be ouer-much addicted vnto vaine Prophecies, and that Melins was prohibited by decree of Counsell, I might alledge his, and that of Aquila at Shaftesbury, both of them foreseeing that the British Empire after the Saxons and Normans, should returne againe to her ancient Stoque and Name. Notwithstanding Truth bids vs acknowledge, how farre God hath accomplished both these in the royall Person of our now-Soueraigne, the one by his descent from the loines of that Roiall Tuder King Henry the Seventh; and the other, by his Edif, in restoring to the Land her ancient Name, Britannia: himselfe being the first Monarch of the two Kingdomes Vnion, and the greatest of Command, since Canutus the Dane. The Cordes of whose Royall Tents, we pray, may be further extended, that those naked Virginians may be couered vnder the Curtaines of his most Christian Government; and that the Scepter of his Peace may bud, as Aarons Rod in his hand, and in the hand of his Sonne, and Sonne Sonnes, so long as the Sunne and Moone endureth.

(7) These then (worthy Reader) are the Heads, whence haue issued such plentifull Springs, that now met together in one Body the Streame is grown very bigge, which thing I euer feared, but could neuer prevent; offending rather with the Niggard who thinketh euery mite too-much, then finning with the Prodigall in superfluous excess; so plenteous is our Story, and so largely requires it to be writ. Through all which my weak body with many yeres labour hath alone trauelled, as well in the reuiewing of the Geographicall parts of the Land, as in the compiling of the succeeding History, though far vnable to perfect either, according to their owne worths. But lest the weight of the whole should rest vpon so slender a propp as myselfe: I haue laid my buildings vpon far stronger arches, as by the many alleged authorities may appeare. For first, the Chards for the most part traced by others, and most of them diuulged vnto view, were the foundations of my begunne paines; in supplying their wants with my many additions, and dimensions of the Shire-townes, and Cities true platformes. The further descriptions of sundry prouinces, I haue gleaned from the famous workes of the most worthy and learned Cambden, whose often sowed feedes in that Soile hath lastly brought forth a most plenteous harvest. For the body of the Historie, many were the manuscripts, notes, and Records, wherewith my honored and learned friends supplied me; but none more (or so many) as did the worthy repaire of eazing times ruines, the learned Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baronet, another Philadelphus in preferring old Monuments, and ancient Records: whose Cabinets were vnlocked, and Library continually fet open to my freecesse: & from whence the chieftest garnishments of this worke haue bene enlarged and brought: such as are the antique altars, & Tropies in Stone, by him preserued from perishing obliuion; The Coines of gold, siluer, alcumy, and copper, of the Britains, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and English, with the Broade Seales of those Kings since the same were in vse: all of them so followed from the originall moddles, and monyes, by the most exquisite and curious hand of our age, as any eye may witness they are the true prints from those stamps. The like most acceptable helpe, both of Bookes and Collections, (especially in matters remoter from our times) I continually receiued from that worthy Diuine, Master John Barkham, a gentleman composed of Learning, Virtue, & Curtisie, as being no lesse ingeniously willing, then learnedly able, to aduance and forward all vertuous endeuours. Besides these, some other supply I haue had: for my disease growne dangerous, and life held in suspense, it behoued him who had towards the publishing bestowed to great cost, to forward the finishing; and to that end hee procured mee to his further charges an * assistant in the liues of our middle English Kings: whose Stories and raignes (by the Iudicious) may by their stiles bee knowne to bee writ with another penne. Lastly for the matters of Heraldrie, the willing and ready paines of Master William Smith, Rough Dragon, (an Officer at armes) was euer at hand: and by these hands this building is mounted to such an height as thou seest: which thus now finished, this scant Epitome, may well serue thy foote-steppe, as staires to ascend these five nationall Stories already finished, and leade thee into the sixth now most happilie begunne. Where from those mounted heights, thou maist behold, how Time hath squared the Stones of these buildings: how Fortune hath varied in contriuing the Worke: and how the Fates haue erected, polished, and puld downe, the supporting Pillars of GREAT BRITAINES THRATRE. From whose Tarraz with Dauid cast not thy lusting eye vpon vnlawfull delights: Nor with Babels King boast, that this was built by thy owne might: But with Moses confesse that from a small stocke (as a graft of the Lords planting) thou art now growne into a great Nation, mighty, and full of people. And with Salomon make supplication vnto thy great Iehouah, that the Arke of his strength may euer rest in this House, & his eyes be euer open thereon day and night. With the Prophet pray that this building may be as beauteous as his, the Foundations laid with Saphires, her Windows with the Emeraude, and her Gates with the Carbuncles. That the defarts of this chosen Zion may be as Eden, and her wilderness like the Garden of God. Her Government Peace, her People the Saints of Salvation, & her Kings the Signes on Gods right hand, successively to sit on this Royall Throne, till Christ the King of Kings shall come in the Cloudes, and from the Raine-Bow the Throne of his Maiefty pronounce vs blessed, and make vs heires with himselfe of that Kingdome, which neuer shall haue end. Vnto which CHRIST, with his FATHER, and HOLY SPIRIT, three in Persons but ONE God eternall, vndivideable in Deity, be ascribed all Praise, Honour, Glorie, Wisdome, Power and might for euermore. Amen.
